In my judgment this result offends against both the letter and the spirit of cl 17 of the contract. The clause specifically provides that sums recovered are to be divided between the guarantors (the defendants) and the merchant (the plaintiffs) in the proportion of 90 and 10. Seeing that by the terms of the guarantee the defendants had accepted 90 per cent of the risk of loss, it would seem only fair and reasonable that they should be entitled to 90 per cent of any sums recovered, whatever these might be. I agree with the submission put forward on behalf of the defendants that it is necessary, when construing cl 17, to look at it in futuro. At the date of the guarantee, and indeed at the date when the defendants paid under it, it could not be known what sums might be subsequently recovered. Apart from other unknown quantities, there might be fluctuations in the rate of exchange, as the result of which the sums recovered, when converted into sterling, might be appreciably less or appreciably more than the artificial figure representing the 'amount of loss', calculated as described above. If the amount recovered were less, the defendants would have to accept 90 per cent of the loss. So equally, if the amount is greater, they should have the benefit of recovering 90 per cent thereof. c d e

This construction seems to me to be in accordance with the plain meaning of the first sentence of cl 17. But I am fortified in my view by consideration of the second sentence of the clause. This provides that the merchant shall pay to the guarantor forthwith all sums recovered, apparently regardless of amount. On the assumption that the defendants are entitled to retain 90 per cent of the sums recovered, this would seem to be a reasonable and sensible provision. But it would be difficult, in my view, to find a sensible reason for it if the plaintiffs are right in asserting that they are entitled in the end to retain everything in excess of 90 per cent of the artificially calculated 'amount of loss'. I find it impossible to accede to the learned judge's view that this second sentence of cl 17 is no more than machinery. f g

As I understand the argument on the other side, what is said is that once there has been a recovery of the agreed 'amount of loss', that is £413,412 12s 0d, and the defendants have been paid back 90 per cent thereof, there is no longer any 'loss to which this Guarantee applies'. Therefore cl 17 no longer applies, and the plaintiffs are entitled to retain the whole of the excess above the agreed figure, since the defendants have already recovered the whole of what they are entitled to under the ordinary rules governing subrogation. In my judgment this contention is not only unrealistic, having regard to the terms of the contract as a whole, but it is also unsound in that it is founded on a confusion between the 'loss' (that is the loss of the dollar price of the goods sold) and the 'amount of loss' as artificially calculated in accordance with cll 7 and 9 and the endorsement attached to the policy. If this had been the real intention of the parties, I feel quite sure that cl 17 of the contract would have been expressed in quite different terms. h i

For these reasons, agreeing with Megaw LJ, I have reached a conclusion contrary to that of the learned judge. I would allow the appeal and answer the question posed by the originating summons in the affirmative, with such consequential results as may flow therefrom.

a DAVIES LJ. I agree with both judgments and do not wish to add anything of my own.

Appeal allowed. Judgment for defendants for £18,017.08 and interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent over bank rate from 1st October 1968 to 4th April 1973. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

f The father and the mother were married in December 1966 and had two children, a girl born in October 1967 and a boy born in October 1969. They lived in a flat in north London. In October 1971 the mother told the father that she was in love with another man, J. The father left for his parents' home in Scotland with the boy and the mother followed with the girl. A reconciliation was attempted and plans made for setting up a new home in Scotland. The mother went back to London with the children with the intention of returning to Scotland. Shortly after, however, the mother telephoned the father to say that, as far as she was concerned, the marriage was at an end and that she was about to start living with J. The mother and J thereafter began to live together as man and wife with the children, to whom the father enjoyed frequent access. At the end of 1971 the mother issued a complaint in the local metropolitan stipendiary magistrates' court under the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971 in which she sought an order for the custody of the children. The complaint was served on the father in Scotland. The complaint was heard by a single stipendiary magistrate and was adjourned. At the adjourned hearing the magistrate sat with a lady justice of the peace who had not been present at the earlier hearing. At the conclusion of the adjourned hearing custody of the children was awarded to the father. The children returned with the father to the father's parents' home in Scotland where they planned to live. The mother applied for legal aid to prosecute an appeal against the order but her application was turned down. Two months later a legal aid certificate was granted to her to issue a summons by which she sought an order that the children be made wards of court and that their care and control be committed to her.

Held – (i) On principle the court in wardship proceedings ought not to make a determination on the merits when there was a subsisting and effective order of a magistrates' court unless some relief was sought which was unobtainable in that court or there were exceptional circumstances. In the instant case the difficulties attendant on the enforcement of orders owing to the absence of the father and children from the jurisdiction of the magistrates' court, the refusal of legal aid to the mother to prosecute her appeal and the possible invalidity of the magistrates' court order in consequence of the change in composition of the court at the adjourned hearing, constituted exceptional circumstances which justified the court in considering and determining the summons on its merits (see p 1005 b and p 1006 c d and h to p 1007 a, post); Re H (G J) (an infant) [1966] 1 All ER 952, Re K (K J S) (an infant) [1966] 3 All ER 154, Re P (infants) [1967] 2 All ER 229, Re P (A J) (an infant) [1968] 1 WLR 1976 applied.

(ii) As a matter of authority and construction, the welfare of the minor was not the only relevant consideration under ss 1^a and 9 (1)^b of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971. The court had to take into account all relevant considerations, but the weight to be attached to any one in particular depended on the extent to which that consideration, if at all, affected the welfare of the minor. In the circumstances, despite the fact that the mother was living with J, whom she was not at that time able to marry, the true welfare of the children would be secured if they were to be brought up by her with frequent and generous access to the father. Accordingly joint custody would be committed to both parents with care and control to the mother and access to the father (see p 1008 d and f and p 1009 e and g h, post); Re L (infants) [1962] 3 All ER 1 explained.

Originating summons

- By summons dated 31st July 1972 the mother asked that the children of the family, g Samantha and Jake, be made wards of court and that their care and control be committed to her. The metropolitan stipendiary court serving the mother's area had on 4th April 1972 dismissed a complaint by the mother for the custody of the children and made an order awarding custody to the father who was residing in Scotland. The mother was unable to obtain legal aid to appeal against the magistrates' order but obtained a legal aid certificate to issue the present summons. The facts are h set out in the judgment which was delivered in open court.

- 20th February. BAGNALL J read the following judgment. In this judgment i I propose to refer to the plaintiff and the defendant as 'the mother' and 'the father' respectively; to the gentleman with whom the mother is living by his Christian name, James; to the father's parents as 'the grandmother' and 'the grandfather' respectively; and to the father's brothers also by their Christian names; and to take other steps so that if this is published it will not be possible to identify any of the parties, and I make the normal request made in these circumstances that that wish shall be observed. I am confident that that will be so.

The mother and the father were married on 3rd December 1966. The mother came from Yorkshire where her parents still live. Before she was married she was a children's nanny and was only 19 on the date of the wedding. The father also had his origins in the north-east of England, but his parents now live in a village in Midlothian. They occupy a three bedroomed house with a garden. The grandfather and the grandmother are both 49 years of age and have had and brought up, or are bringing up, six sons. Of those, two are still at home; Christopher, aged 15 and Martin aged 11. There is another son, Stephen, who is at Oxford University, and is at home at times during the year on vacation.

The father was the second of those six sons and at the time of the marriage was even younger than the mother, not quite 18. The father had been brought up as a Roman Catholic; the mother as a Protestant. I state those last facts, but it is common ground in this case that nothing turns on them.

After a short time in furnished rooms the mother and father established a matrimonial home in a flat in north London. In the flat there were at all times four potential bedrooms, a kitchen with a bath in it, a living room and lavatory accommodation. The flat is situated over premises owned by the company which was the mother's employer, and was held by the mother on a service tenancy at a rent of £2.75 a week. The rent book has at all material times been in the mother's name, and though the relevant service tenancy was, for reasons into which I need not go, signed by both the spouses, there is no doubt that the mother was the tenant. Though her work has now ended the tenancy has been continued and no indication has been given of any intention to terminate it.

In due course the two children with whom I am concerned were born; a daughter, Samantha, on 19th October 1967, and a son, Jake, two years later on 23rd October 1969.

In April 1970 the father, who was then just 21, had an operation known as vasectomy, which I am told is irreversible. That step was taken because the mother was having difficulty with various contraceptive devices that were tried. The step was proposed with the agreement of the mother, but, though at a later stage I think she had some change of heart and sought to persuade the father not to have the operation, he was determined to do so. In the events that have happened that operation was indeed a tragedy, and I think it should be said that now that both legislation and modern mores have rendered the bonds of matrimony so fragile, a very heavy burden of responsibility lies on those who are called to give advice in such matters, particularly to those who are only just out of infancy.

The father's trade was that of a chef. During the greater part of the marriage he carried on two jobs in that trade, which involved working from early morning to mid or late afternoon; and then after a break of an hour or two again until very late at night. He did this five days every week with the laudable object of earning money which he could save, primarily for a house, though I think that at times the possibility of buying a motor car entered his mind. The mother knew the reasons why the father was working so hard, but, as I find, never knew the amount of his savings, which, by the end of 1971, had reached at least £250 and as events proved the father was able to lay his hands on a further sum at that stage of about £150 out of his own money.

I have referred to one tragedy in the married life of this young couple. I think that the second tragedy was that the father never really appreciated the dangers that were inherent in the course that he had decided to take, and in particular in leaving his young wife alone so many days every week and for such long hours. There was some criticism, apart from that misfortune, of the father's behaviour as a husband, but, apart from a propensity to gambling on horses which he admitted, those criticisms were not pursued.

During this period the mother busied herself in local affairs and was particularly interested in a local community play centre where, in accordance with a not infrequent modern habit, she took the children—first Samantha, and then later Jake.

a At the play centre she met in May 1971 James, a young man who is now 24 years of age. James had left school at the age of 17 with the modest educational attainment of two 'O' Levels and a burning desire to become a schoolteacher. He found himself employment successively in two departments of the Civil Service, and at the same time lived and worked at the community play centre where he earned a small remuneration and was given time and opportunity to pursue his studies in search of further 'O' Levels. He hoped by that means eventually to qualify for admission to a suitable teachers' training college and to obtain for the purposes of his further studies a government grant.

b James became a friend of the mother and also of the father, and was a frequent visitor to the matrimonial home. In due course his feelings for the mother and hers for him progressed beyond friendship to affection, and eventually to love.

c In October 1971 the mother told the father that she and James were in love with one another. I accept the mother's evidence that on at least one occasion, probably after she had met James, she had remonstrated with the father for the long hours which he was working and leaving her alone; but I am satisfied also that she did not bring home to him, and he never appreciated, the danger to the marriage that was inherent in the situation. After the mother's revelation there was a scene or scenes, during the course of which the father struck the mother at least once, and also came to blows with James, who however did not retaliate.

d The father set off for Scotland, and the grandfather's home, with Jake. The mother followed shortly after with Samantha. In Scotland there were discussions from which it appeared that the past would be forgotten and that a reconciliation would be achieved. The father set out to buy accommodation in Edinburgh while the mother returned to London with the two children, the intention being that if all went well she should return later and they would continue their marriage in Scotland. The father was able to acquire a flat with a sum of £650 borrowed from the grandfather, a £500 bank loan and the savings that he had accumulated; and he also obtained employment in Edinburgh in his trade as a chef. He visited the children during this period every two weeks, and so maintained contact with them.

e However, a reconciliation was not to be achieved, because on 15th November 1971 by means of a telephone conversation the mother made it clear to the father that so far as she was concerned the marriage was at an end and that she was living, or was about to start living, with James. I accept the evidence of the mother and James, if indeed this be relevant, that they had not committed adultery until this stage in the history of events. But immediately they began to live together as man and wife with Samantha and Jake in the flat which had been the matrimonial home.

g There they all remained until 4th April 1972. Again during that period there was frequent access enjoyed by the father, who maintained again close contact with the children.

h At the end of 1971 the mother caused to be issued in the appropriate metropolitan stipendiary court for the district in which she lived a complaint under the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971 seeking an order that the custody of the children be committed to her. The complaint was served on the father in Scotland by an official who would have been the appropriate person to effect such service in Scottish proceedings.

j Before I turn to the further progress of those proceedings I must recite some of the statutory provisions that are applicable. First, the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971, s 9 (1):

'The court may, on the application of the mother or father of a minor (who may apply without next friend), make such order regarding—(a) the custody of the minor; and (b) the right of access to the minor of his mother or father, as the court thinks fit having regard to the welfare of the minor and to the conduct and wishes of the mother and father.'

Section 15, so far as material, provides:

'(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, "the court" for the purposes of this Act means . . . (c) a magistrates' court having jurisdiction in the place in which any of the said persons resides . . .

'(3) A county court or magistrates' court shall not have jurisdiction under this Act in any case where the respondent or any of the respondents resides in Scotland or Northern Ireland—(a) except in so far as such jurisdiction may be exercisable by virtue of the following provisions of this section; or (b) unless a summons or other originating process can be served and is served on the respondent or, as the case may be, on the respondents in England or Wales.

'(4) An order under this Act giving the custody of a minor to the mother, whether with or without an order requiring the father to make payments to the mother towards the minor's maintenance, may be made, if the father resides in Scotland or Northern Ireland and the mother and the minor in England or Wales, by a magistrates' court having jurisdiction in the place in which the mother resides.

'(5) It is hereby declared that a magistrates' court has jurisdiction—(a) in proceedings under this Act by a person residing in Scotland or Northern Ireland against a person residing in England or Wales for an order relating to the custody of a minor (including, in the case of proceedings by the mother, an order requiring the father to make payments to the mother towards the minor's maintenance) . . .

Section 16, so far as material, provides:

'(3) Subject to subsection (4) of this section, where on an application to a magistrates' court under this Act the court makes or refuses to make an order, an appeal shall lie to the High Court.

'(4) Where an application is made to a magistrates' court under this Act, and the court considers that the matter is one which would more conveniently be dealt with by the High Court, the magistrates' court may refuse to make an order, and in that case no appeal shall lie to the High Court.'

I interpose that the appeal so described was formerly to a judge of the Chancery Division specifically assigned for the purpose, but is now to a Divisional Court of the Family Division.

The Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, s 56 (2), provides:

'A magistrates' court when hearing domestic proceedings shall be composed of not more than three justices of the peace, including, so far as practicable, both a man and a woman.'

Section 98 (6) of that Act provides:

'Subject to the provisions of the next following subsection, the justices composing the court before which any proceedings take place shall be present during the whole of the proceedings: Provided that, if during the course of the proceedings any justice absents himself, he shall cease to act further therein and, if the remaining justices are enough to satisfy the requirements of the preceding provisions of this section, the proceedings may continue before a court composed of those justices.'

Section 98 (7) is not material; s 98 (8) provides:

'This section shall have effect subject to the provisions of this Act relating to domestic proceedings.'

The Administration of Justice Act 1964, s 11, so far as material, provides:

'(1) For the purpose of exercising jurisdiction to hear domestic proceedings a

- a* magistrates' court for an inner London petty sessions area shall be composed of—(a) a metropolitan stipendiary magistrate as chairman and one or two lay justices; or (b) two or three lay justices; or, if it is not practicable for such a court to be so composed, the court shall for that purpose be composed of a metropolitan stipendiary magistrate sitting alone; and section 56 (2) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 (composition of magistrates' courts for hearing domestic proceedings) shall not apply to a magistrates' court for any such area.
- b* '(2) A domestic court for an inner London petty sessions area which includes lay justices shall, so far as practicable, include both a man and a woman.'

Domestic proceedings for the purposes of those sections plainly include proceedings under the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971.

- The first appointment for the hearing of the mother's complaint was a date in January 1972. On that date both the mother and the father were present and were represented by a solicitor or counsel. There were discussions between, at any rate, the professional advisers outside the court, and the father frankly said in his evidence that he was apprehensive lest an order should be made giving custody to the mother and was anxious in those circumstances to conclude an agreement as to the access that he should be allowed in that event on the most favourable terms. What he was seeking, apart from ordinary access, was to have the children to stay with him in Scotland for a week after Christmas, for a week after Easter and for four weeks during the summer holiday. The mother took the view that perhaps four weeks would be too long and hoped that agreement would be reached at two weeks, but otherwise acceded to the father's requests.

- e* At this stage undoubtedly a misunderstanding occurred, but I am not, I think, concerned with its causation. The father was concerned to resist the application, and indeed had himself consulted solicitors in Edinburgh at an earlier stage with a view to obtaining an order in an appropriate court that custody should be committed to him. The mother equally sincerely believed that the father was conceding that custody should be granted to her, and that all that was in issue was the amount of access that should be ordered.

- f* The hearing of the complaint was not started, but arrangements were made for a welfare officer to report, in particular on conditions at the matrimonial home where the children were then living. I anticipate by saying that at a later stage a welfare report was also obtained from an appropriate officer in Scotland on conditions at the grandparents' home in Midlothian, and I wish to record my indebtedness to both those reports.

- g* The next hearing of the complaint took place on 17th February 1972 before the metropolitan stipendiary magistrate sitting alone. Evidence was taken from the mother, James and the father, and the matter was then adjourned to 4th April. On that date the hearing was resumed, but this time before the same metropolitan stipendiary magistrate and a lady justice of the peace. The father gave further evidence under cross-examination, and two other witnesses, friends of the parties
- h* in London, also gave evidence.

In the result, at the conclusion of the evidence, the magistrates ordered the custody of both the children to be committed to the father, and ordered reasonable access to be allowed to the mother. The reasons, as set out in the note of evidence that is before me, suitably edited to avoid identification, read as follows:

- i* '(1) Adulterer should not take place of husband as father. (2) Environmental grounds [Midlothian] compared with [the district in London where the matrimonial home was situated]. (3) Possibility of [James] leaving—and doubt about his ability to pass teachers exams. (4) More in interest of children. (5) Husband behaved responsibly—impressed as truthful person.'

It is apparent from those reasons, and from a note taken by counsel—a copy of which was put before me—and from the evidence filed on this application, that the magistrates took the view that the area of the matrimonial home was a bad place for any children to be brought up; that they took a wholly critical view of James; and thirdly, I think, that the magistrates, adopting perhaps the philosophy of an earlier generation, regarded the break up of the marriage as a confrontation between a wholly innocent and a wholly guilty spouse, rather than the misfortune shared by, and contributed to by both, which on recent high authority it is now recognised to be.

An application was made to the magistrates for a stay of execution pending an appeal, but was refused. In announcing that refusal the magistrates expressed the view that if their decision should turn out to be wrong, the sojourn of the children in Scotland pursuant to the order would be in no way materially different from a normal period of access. On the same day the children went to Scotland with the father and the grandmother, where they have lived ever since.

On 5th May 1972 a notice of appeal in proper form was issued on behalf of the mother and served on the father. But on 23rd May 1972 the mother's application for a legal aid certificate to enable her to prosecute the appeal was refused. In the face of that refusal it was for all practical purposes impossible for the mother to go on with the proposed appeal, and no further steps were taken in it. Two months later, on 21st July 1972, the mother was granted a legal aid certificate to pursue these proceedings, and either then or at a later stage the certificate permitted her, and the father's corresponding legal aid certificate permitted him, to have the assistance of leading counsel. I have not investigated, nor would it be right for me to investigate, the reasons behind this apparent inconsistency in the attitudes of those concerned with the administration of the Legal Aid and Advice Act 1940. That being so, it would not be right for me to make further comment.

On 31st July 1972 this originating summons was issued by the mother, claiming that the children should be made wards of court and that care and control of them be committed to her. At the time of the issue and service of the originating summons the children were in London and the father was visiting them for the purpose of taking them back to Scotland. That being so, a summons was issued to obtain interlocutory relief designed to ensure that the children should remain in England pending the hearing of the application. On 10th August 1972 Watkins J ordered that the mother should return the children to the father, who should have leave to keep them outside England and Wales on the usual undertaking to return them within the jurisdiction when called on to do so, and a direction for access was given. Finally, on 22nd September 1972 an order was made by the learned registrar for the filing of evidence and other ancillary matters, and directions were given that this application be referred to a judge for hearing on oral evidence.

I interpose here a statement of the great indebtedness I have felt to all counsel for the assistance which has been given to me on a number of difficult topics, and I would wish to go further. I have found that the conduct of this case has in every way been exemplary, not only on the part of counsel and solicitors—that after all is to be expected—but also by the mother and the father and all other persons closely involved. I am satisfied, and it is gratifying to record, that everyone concerned has been throughout moved by a single-minded desire to do what is best for these children.

A number of preliminary questions of law arise; the first of which is to what extent is the order of the magistrates valid and effective under the statutory provisions I have read, having regard to the change in the composition of the Bench between 17th February 1972 and 4th April 1972, and the method of service of the complaint on the father.

Such a change in composition has been described as a gross irregularity in a number of reported cases. I cite one by way of example. In *Munday v Munday*¹ the justices a had made a financial order against a husband in these circumstances. The application was first heard by three justices; an adjournment was ordered, and at the second hearing there were present the three previous justices and two additional justices. Further evidence was given and a further adjournment ordered. At the final hearing the two justices who had been added at the intermediate hearing, and one who had not attended either of the previous hearings, were present. The three justices who had been present on the first occasion and on the second occasion, were all absent. Their decision was brought on appeal to a Divisional Court and Lord Merriman P said¹:

c 'It is right to say that no objection was taken to the change in the composition of the court by the addition of these two extra justices. It is also right to point out that owing to the definition of "domestic proceedings", an application for the variation of an order under the summary jurisdiction (separation and maintenance) code does not come within the definition, and, therefore, there was nothing vitally wrong in the fact that five justices were sitting. Nor is it necessary, I think, to consider what would have been the position if the matter had ended there, with the original three justices sitting with two additional justices and a certain amount of the evidence, no doubt, being taken again. It is true that there was a quorum on the last occasion, but it seems to me to be impossible by any process of reasoning to say of the order arrived at by this curious procedure that the justices composing the court before which any proceedings took place were present during the whole of the proceedings. I am unable to accept the argument that in substance there was a hearing de novo before the tribunal of three on the last occasion. It is not the fact, and I do not propose to go through an analysis of the findings. Suffice it to say that it is plain beyond a doubt that a great deal of what these justices have set out as findings of fact was derived from evidence appearing on the notes of the first hearing, at which not one of them was present, and I repeat that one of the three sitting on the last occasion had not been present on any previous hearing of this application at all. Apart from the consideration that section 98 (6) of the Act of 1952 is mandatory, and contains no dispensing power which is remotely relevant to these proceedings, I think there are wider considerations still, for it seems to me that this is pre-eminently a case in which the principle that justice must not merely be done, but must manifestly be seen to be done, has been infringed.'

Davies J agreed and adopted the reasoning of the learned President and the appeal was allowed.

g On the other hand it is plain that in a case in which it is clear on the merits that the order of the justices was right, it is open to a Divisional Court to affirm their decision notwithstanding the irregularities. That is established in *Bolton v Bolton*². In that case there was a similar irregularity, but after reviewing the authorities and holding that the irregularity was manifestly established, Lord Merriman P said³:

h 'Having said that, I am bound to say that I think this case is so clear that we should be in danger of doing a grave wrong if we were to send it back, as the husband asked us to do, for a re-hearing, and I, therefore—but with the general protest which I have uttered—propose that we should follow the course taken by the Court of Appeal in *Coleshill v. Manchester Corporation*⁴ and decide that it is unnecessary to take objection to what happened on this occasion.'

j The situation with which I am faced was that which Lord Merriman P forbore to consider in *Munday v Munday*¹. Nevertheless, on principle and on authority I have no doubt that it was an irregularity on which, if an appeal had been prosecuted, the case would have been sent back to be determined by a freshly constituted Bench, unless the Divisional Court, on a consideration of all the facts, had concluded that the order was clearly right. a

The defect of service is in a different category and is the merest technicality. Maybe it was in any event remedied by the attendance of the father, both in person and by counsel; or could have been remedied either by reservice on the father in England, or by the issue of a cross-complaint on his behalf. But I am not sitting, and could not sit, on appeal from the magistrates. The order therefore in my judgment is a valid and effective order, unless it should be, after leave given, reversed by the Divisional Court. On the other hand, in common with all orders relating to infants, it is an order having effect until further order, so that any order of any court of competent jurisdiction inconsistent with the order of the magistrates would effectively determine it. b

The second question of law is whether I should hear and determine this originating summons on its merits, or leave the mother to make a further application in the magistrates' court based on such changes in circumstances as she can establish. On this question I was referred to a number of cases recently decided in the Chancery Division. c

The first is *Re H (G J) (an infant)*². In that case the magistrates had made an order giving custody of an infant to the mother, and the mother applied by originating summons for the child to be made a ward of court and for an injunction restraining the father from taking the child out of the jurisdiction. In the course of his judgment Stamp J said³: d

'Counsel for the mother has taken me through the provisions conferring on magistrates powers in relation to the custody of infant children. I am quite satisfied from the terms of the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, and more particularly from the decision of BATESON, J., in *Vigon v. Vigon and Kuttner*⁴, and the remarks of members of the Court of Appeal in *Re M. (an infant)*⁵, which are set out in *Re G. (infants)*⁶, that the prerogative powers of the Queen as parens patriae in relation to infants are not destroyed, but at most limited, as a result of the exercise of powers in relation to infants in magistrates' courts. In my judgment the order of the Bury magistrates' court granting custody of the child to the mother in no way precludes this court from making orders, in the exercise of prerogative powers of the Queen in relation to infants, not inconsistent with the orders made by the magistrates' court. What I am asked to do today is merely to make an order which will supplement the order which has already been made in relation to the infant by the magistrates' court and this I will do.'

In *Re K (K J S) (an infant)*⁷, magistrates had made an order giving custody of an infant to the mother, and the father issued an appropriate originating summons asking for the child to be made a ward and for directions for his care and control. Buckley J said⁸: f

'In these proceedings the only relief which the court is asked to grant is with regard to access, apart from formal relief in the sense that the court is asked to

- a continue the wardship of the infant, and it is suggested that the court should give the care and control of the infant to the mother, in whose care and control he already is under the order of the justices. The father, who is the plaintiff, complains that the access which is offered by the mother is unsatisfactory and unsuitable; and the mother takes the view that the kind of access demanded by the father is equally unsatisfactory and unsuitable, although for different reasons.
- b This is a matter which could perfectly well have been raised in proceedings before the justices, who already have been seized of the matter. They have already made an order according the father reasonable access and his proper course, if he considered he was not getting reasonable access, was to go back to the magistrates and ask that they should make a more specific order as to the kind of access which he should have. It is undesirable, in my judgment, when the magistrates have made a custody order and an order relating to access, that
- c the party who is dissatisfied with the way in which effect is being given to that order should seek to meet that state of affairs by instituting proceedings under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, instead of going back to the magistrates who have dealt with the matter. It would be another state of affairs altogether if some kind of relief were sought which the magistrates could not provide, as for instance, an injunction; but there is nothing of that kind here and, in my judgment, these proceedings are really quite wrong.'

And the learned judge directed that the child should cease to be a ward of court.

- In *Re P (infants)*¹ the father had custody of two infant children under an order of the competent justices. The mother appealed to the High Court against that order and the appeal was dismissed by the assigned judge of the Chancery Division.
- e In due course the mother issued an originating summons invoking the wardship jurisdiction and asking for directions as to the care and control of the children. Stamp J said²:

- 'Two questions arise: first, has this court, in the exercise of its parental jurisdiction over children, jurisdiction to make an order which may conflict with an order made by a magistrates' court in exercise of the statutory jurisdiction under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925; second, assuming the answer to the first question to be in the affirmative, ought that jurisdiction to be exercised or ought the court to make an order simply de-warding the children. In my judgment, the answer to the first question must clearly be in the affirmative: that the exercise of a limited statutory jurisdiction over children does not, in the absence of express words in the statute, fetter the powers of the Chancery Division in exercising the jurisdiction of the Crown as parens patriae over wards of court.'
- f
- g

- The learned judge then referred to a number of authorities some of which I have cited, and also referred to *Re S (an infant)*³, and distinguished that case; and went on as follows⁴:
- h

- 'Parliament has conferred on magistrates powers under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, and, applying the decision of BUCKLEY, J., in *Re K. (K. J. S.) (an infant)*⁵, I hold that when magistrates have made an order for custody, then unless some relief is sought which the magistrates cannot give, the forum conveniens for a reconsideration of that order is prima facie the magistrates' court. For the purpose of deciding whether to entertain a wardship application where a magistrates' court has already made a custody order, the judge before whom the matter comes must enquire into the case to the extent necessary to determine whether relief is genuinely sought which the magistrates are not empowered to give, or whether there is some very special reason for invoking the wardship jurisdiction.' a

It is to be observed that the whole of the judgment of the learned judge in that case was strictly speaking obiter dictum, because by the time he gave his judgment it had been announced that the parties had resolved their differences by agreement. The learned judge gave a judgment in view of the questions of public importance that were raised. b

Lastly, in *Re P (A J) (An Infant)*¹ custody had been awarded to the mother of the infant by the appropriate justices, but the father had neither complied with the order nor appealed against it. In due course the father issued an originating summons invoking the wardship jurisdiction and the mother moved the court for an order terminating the wardship and in substance terminating the proceedings in limine. Four submissions were put before Cooke J, sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division, why the wardship proceedings should be allowed to go on. First, that relief was sought which the justices were not competent to afford. The learned judge held that no such relief was genuinely sought. Secondly, that there were special considerations applicable, such as had been adumbrated or referred to by Stamp J in the previous case. Thirdly, that there had been a change in circumstances since the decision of the justices. On that the learned judge said²: c

'As to that, it appears to me that if there has been a material change in circumstances there is nothing to prevent the father from applying to the magistrates to vary their order. In *In re Andrews (Infants)*³, Upjohn J. pointed out that where the infant has been the subject-matter of orders as to custody, care and control in the Divorce Division of the High Court it might become necessary for the Chancery judge to entertain applications relating to the infant "at any rate where there has been a change of circumstances since the Order of the Divorce Division, or some wholly new question arises." It is plain, from the examples which Upjohn J. gives, that he is speaking of cases where the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division is more extensive, or more efficacious, or more convenient, than that of the other court. Following the principles enunciated by Upjohn J. I should not regard such a change of circumstances, as is here referred to, as a ground for interposing the wardship jurisdiction.' d

Lastly, it was submitted that the case involved complex issues, and reliance was placed on some observations of Pennycuik J in *Re W (J C) (an infant)*⁴. On that submission Cooke J said⁵: e

'When Pennycuik J. referred to cases of complexity, I do not think he intended to embrace all cases under the Guardianship of Infants Acts where the decision might involve difficult questions. The case with which he was concerned was one in which the magistrates had awarded custody to one parent, and care and control to the other. The view which Pennycuik J. took⁶, and from which the Court of Appeal subsequently differed⁷, was that the magistrates had no power to do that. It was in that context that Pennycuik J. referred to cases of f a complexity, and I think it is fair to conclude that he was thinking primarily of cases where the magistrates did not have power to make the order appropriate to the circumstances of the case.'

That is a formidable body of authority which propounds as a principle that the court in wardship proceedings will not make a determination on the merits where there is a subsisting and effective order of the magistrates' court, unless either some relief is sought which cannot be obtained in that court, or there are some other wholly exceptional circumstances; and that neither changes in the relevant facts, nor mere complexity in the issues involved, constitute exceptional circumstances.

b Though the authorities are not binding on me, I should follow them unless I were plainly and beyond doubt convinced that they were wrong. Counsel for the mother submitted that they were wrongly decided and that I should not follow them.

c Alternatively, he submitted that even if they were rightly decided when wardship cases and appeals from magistrates on questions of custody were heard in the Chancery Division, a wholly different situation exists now in that those matters and suits for dissolution of marriage are brought together in the Family Division, and that henceforth the practice formerly established in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division should be followed in wardship cases. Counsel for the mother bases his

d submissions on the principle, which he says is of general application, that the courts are open to all, so that if a litigant has something to litigate he is entitled as of right to litigate it in the court of competent jurisdiction of his choice. In particular he submits that the High Court is a superior court which exercises a general control over the proceedings and orders of a court of petty session. Quite apart from this general principle, he points to a number of instances in which, he submits, the High Court in wardship matters is not debarred from determining cases on their merits e by the existence of an order even of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

There were four classes of case. First, counsel for the mother pointed to the principle established in relation to orders of a foreign court in cases such as *McKee v McKee*¹, that the court in this country should exercise an independent judgment, simply giving such weight as it might think fit to the foreign judgment. But counsel was f constrained to admit an exception to this principle in the so-called kidnapping cases, exemplified by *Re H (infants)*².

The second class of cases are those in which the wardship jurisdiction was invoked where there were already proceedings relating to the same question in what was formerly the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, and counsel referred me to three cases, *Re Andrews (Infants)*³, to which reference has already been made in the g cases I have cited; and its corresponding case, *Andrews v Andrews and Sullivan*⁴; and the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Hall v Hall*⁵. It is plain from the principles enunciated and applied in those cases that the existence of proceedings in, or even orders of, the former Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division could not prevent the court exercising its wardship jurisdiction on the merits, and that, due regard being paid to the principles of comity referred to by Donovan LJ in *Hall v Hall*⁵, the h wardship jurisdiction might well prevail and curtail the jurisdiction in matrimonial suits. Now that the Family Division has been constituted, it seems to me that in practice there will be very few, if any, cases in which a potential conflict of this nature will arise.

Thirdly, counsel for the mother submits that in matrimonial suits the High Court has always assumed an unfettered power to deal with questions of custody on their j merits, despite the existence of orders of a magistrates' court; and he relies on

*Vigon v Vigon and Kuttner*¹ where, in dealing with ancillary matters on a husband's petition for dissolution of marriage, Bateson J made an order giving custody to the husband notwithstanding an existing order in favour of the wife of a competent magistrates' court. Apart from this authority, my own limited experience, and the longer experience of all counsel, confirmed that this was established practice.

Lastly, I was referred to *Official Solicitor v K*² in which the ratio decidendi of the decision of the House of Lords was that the principle that the welfare of infants was the first and paramount consideration applied not only to substantive decisions but also to decisions on matters of procedure.

Notwithstanding those instances and authorities, and counsel for the mother's cogent and persuasive arguments, I do not accept either his principal or his alternative submission. The control which the High Court exercises over courts of inferior jurisdiction can, it seems to me, only be exercised in accordance with established law. This necessarily includes legislation and rules of court, but in my judgment it goes further. Just as in the field of substantive law the principles of the common law and equity are established and developed by decisions and precedents, so also in adjectival law; and in that field it is open to the courts by decision and the principle of stare decisis to establish as a matter of law those cases in which its jurisdiction may or may not be invoked. This the authorities which counsel for the mother attacks have done, and in my judgment have rightly done. Moreover, in my view, they are not inconsistent with the authorities on which he relies.

The existence of an order of a foreign court is itself an exceptional circumstance which raises a number of special problems, notably of enforcement. As to a potential conflict with an order in a matrimonial suit, and the practice of the court in matrimonial suits, there is always an actual or projected dissolution of marriage and a change of status of the persons principally involved. And in its matrimonial jurisdiction the High Court is concerned with other ancillary matters separate from, but often closely concerned with, the welfare of children of the family which may make it desirable for that court to deal at the same time with all those questions. This is an exceptional circumstance, absent where there are only wardship proceedings.

Lastly, though it is true that the welfare of infants is paramount, even in relation to procedural matters, in my judgment it is open to the court to determine that in the absence of special circumstances that welfare is achieved by avoiding a multiplicity of proceedings in different courts. In my opinion, to change the practice simply because now all infant matters in the High Court have been brought together in one Division would be a retrograde step. In particular, I should regard it as lamentable to cast any doubt on the efficacy and usefulness of the jurisdiction of magistrates' courts throughout the country in securing the welfare of children.

I must next consider whether there are in this case any such exceptional circumstances as, on the authorities, will justify my considering and determining this application on its merits. Counsel for the mother relies on three. First, the husband and, at present, the children are in Scotland and difficulties may arise on matters of enforcement of orders and the giving and seeking of undertakings with which the magistrates' court cannot effectively deal. Secondly, the mother was for all practical purposes precluded from seeking the determination of the High Court on the decision of the magistrates in this case by the refusal to her of legal aid for the purposes of her appeal. Thirdly, or perhaps a subsidiary part of the second ground, counsel points to the manifest objections that can be taken to the validity of the order of the magistrates.

I can deal with this submission shortly, because the contrary argument was but faintly urged by counsel for the father. I simply state that in my judgment they do together constitute special circumstances within the meaning of that expression as a used in the cases to which I have referred. I only add that in my judgment it is established by the recent decision in the Court of Appeal in *Fakes v Taylor Woodrow Construction Ltd*¹ that I am not precluded by the legislation relating to legal aid from so regarding the second circumstance on which counsel for the mother relies.

b Since the order of the magistrates on 4th April 1972 there have been a number of changes. The children, of course, have been living with the grandparents in Scotland. The flat which the father acquired has been sub-let by him to university students on terms under which it is available for use by him, or others with his consent, during university vacations. The father now lives with the grandparents and has changed his employment. He is now employed on night shifts, which last from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. Making due allowance for his need for sleep, he has greater opportunity of spending time with the children. The present living arrangements in Scotland are that the grandparents occupy one bedroom; Christopher, Martin and the father c another bedroom; and the two children with whom I am concerned the third bedroom. When Stephen is at home from university temporary arrangements have to be made for his sleeping, though he is, and can be, accommodated in the father's flat in Edinburgh.

d In London a third bedroom has been decorated, and the damp which was referred to in evidence before the magistrates has been eradicated. There will thus be a bedroom for the mother and James, and if it was thought desirable a bedroom for each of the children during times which they spend in London. James has attained his target of six 'O' Levels and has been accepted at a suitable teachers' training college, forming part of the administrative organisation of London University. If he pursues his studies successfully he could expect to qualify as a teacher in 1975, or e 1976 if his ambition takes him in pursuit of a degree. Contact has been made with the mother's parents in Yorkshire, who, perhaps understandably, though retaining their love for the mother, were at first loth to accept James. As I understand it, he has now been accepted as a quasi son-in-law by them and has paid visits to them. James has been awarded a grant of £895 a year to pursue his studies. He also continues f to work at the community play centre where he earns £35 a month. I understand that if the care and control of the children were to be awarded to the mother and they lived with her and James, the grant would be appropriately increased. The union of the mother and James has remained stable, and indeed on 29th December 1972 the mother gave birth to a daughter, Victoria, of whom James is the father.

g There has been very frequent access, both for long and short periods, during which the mother has seen the children in London and in Scotland; and the children have been in close contact by that means, and by telephone calls, with the mother. They have of course been in close contact with the father. The welfare officer on 17th February 1972 reported that James was a responsible person, who appeared to have a satisfactory relationship with both the mother and the children, and I think that relationship has been confirmed.

h In addition to the affidavit evidence, I have heard oral evidence from the mother and father, and from James, and the grandmother, and I have had an opportunity of talking to them myself and forming my own opinion of their respective characters and dispositions. The father, though he may have proved himself at least an unwise husband, is undoubtedly a devoted and responsible father, and it is accepted on all sides that in this capacity no criticism can be made of him. The mother has taken a lover and is susceptible of criticism as a wife, and in some respects as a mother, because where young children are involved the two capacities cannot be wholly i distinguished. That apart, it is accepted that nothing can be said against her as a mother. She is competent, responsible and devoted to the children. The grandmother seemed to me to be a wholly admirable character, though I think that she may, in her sympathy for, and eagerness to help, the father have underestimated the burden that may rest on her over the next ten to 15 years if she undertakes the task of being the woman primarily responsible for the upbringing of these two children. James of course was the other man in the triangle and was the ultimate cause of the breakdown of the marriage, though I think not the only cause. In particular I suspect that had the marriage gone on in the pattern that had been established, if James had not been cast in that role another man would. Apart from those considerations, I was impressed with James. He seemed to me to be ambitious, determined and single-minded in his efforts to qualify himself for the post of a schoolteacher. He was sensible of his responsibilities as the father of Victoria, and I think would be equally sensible of the similar, but not identical, responsibilities if care of these children were committed to the mother. a

Section 9 of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971, on an application to the justices or to this court invoking the statute, requires the court to have regard to the welfare of the minor and to the conduct and the wishes of the mother and the father. Section 1, which applies not only to wardship proceedings but also to statutory proceedings, contains the well-known requirement that the court shall regard the welfare of the minor as the first and paramount consideration. b

In my view there is no inconsistency between the two sections. It is plain as a matter of construction, and established by authority, that the welfare of the children is not the only relevant consideration. On the other hand, in my view, as a matter of semantics a paramount consideration must be a consideration to which all other considerations are to be subordinated. A special consideration that has been ventilated in this case is the conduct of the mother, and I was referred to *Re L (infants)*¹. In that case the Court of Appeal took the view that the conduct of the mother had been reprehensible in that she had been responsible for the break-up of the matrimonial home, and reversed the decision of the trial judge committing care and control to her because he ought to have, but had not, taken that conduct into consideration. However, in my view an analysis of the ratio decidendi of that case indicates that the Court of Appeal was not treating the conduct of the mother as an extraneous consideration lying outside the paramount consideration, but treated that conduct as part of its assessment of where the welfare of the children really lay. On any view there are logical problems in applying the statute and reconciling the authorities. In my judgment, the court must take into account all relevant considerations, but the weight to be attached to any particular consideration must depend on the extent to which, and the manner in which, if at all, that consideration affects the welfare of the child or children concerned. I think that this conclusion accords with the views expressed by Megarry J in *Re F (an infant)*². c

The choices are between life in Scotland with a loving father and grandparents and substantially older, though still young, uncles, and life in London with an equally loving mother and her lover, whose child she has borne, and whom she wishes (a wish shared by him) to marry if she should be free to do so. Scotland has advantages in environment both immediate, in the house itself, and in the general neighbourhood, though accommodation in the house will be more cramped than in London, at any rate so far as sleeping space is concerned, so long as the father's brothers are there with the family. It is, of course, a long established family home, though that situation would change if the father no longer lived there, and the prospects would depend on when and why he left, and in particular whether he remarried. He has no present intention of doing either, though the possibility must be borne in mind. d

London has the advantage of close and constant contact with a loving mother in a normal, in the sense of a two-generation, family with a younger half-sister and possibly a further half-sister or half-brother. This substantial and undoubted advantage must e a be discounted for the fact that the mother played a large part in the break-up of the marriage, a fact which must cast some doubt on the stability of the present ménage.

Counsel for the father prays in aid a further disadvantage of life in London. James, he said, will gradually supplant the father in the children's mind to their disadvantage. It seems to me that if this argument were sound it would prevail wherever, after a broken marriage, a mother took a new partner, whether within or outside marriage, who was of an age with the father. Put in that way the argument is in my view unsound, but in any event I am satisfied that having regard to the frequent opportunities there would be for access to the father if the children were in London, and perhaps later in Yorkshire, where ultimately James hopes to obtain an appointment as a teacher, and having regard to my assessment of James, it is not a consideration which should influence me in this case.

c In the end I have to decide how far to discount the advantage of living with the mother for the considerations personal to her and James that I have mentioned; and whether that advantage, so discounted, is outweighed by the net advantage of life in Scotland. I was referred to a number of cases in which a similar problem had been solved, and these have of course afforded me assistance in seeing how other judges have approached the problem and found a solution to it. On the other hand, a close analysis of the facts in those cases, and a process of seeking to compare those facts with the facts before me, seem to me to be more likely to cloud than assist judgment. Though the discretion I have to exercise is a judicial discretion, in the end the decision must be made as an individual and perhaps even as a parent.

e I have reached the conclusion, not without considerable hesitation, that the true welfare of these two children will be secured if they are allowed to be brought up by their mother, with frequent and generous access to the father. I add only two matters. I should have reached that conclusion with less hesitation if the mother had been alone and able, as she is now, to give her full time to bringing up the children; or if she had remarried. I do not think that I should be deterred from reaching the same conclusion simply because her union with James is not that of a married couple. In any event, it is to be borne in mind that if that be a disadvantage to the children it is one that can be removed by the father almost at the stroke of a pen. Secondly, it should not be taken to be a corollary to the conclusion I have reached that in April 1972 I should have reached a different decision from that which commended itself to the magistrates. The circumstances are now, in many important respects, different from those that obtained then. I think that the interest which the father has properly taken, and will throughout their lives continue to take, in these children should be recognised by the formal authority of one who has custody, and I think that the proper order to make would be to commit custody jointly to the mother and the father, directing that these proceedings be amended to enable that to be done by entitling them in the matter of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971 as well as the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1949. I shall simply direct reasonable access, confident that as they have in the past so in the future these parents will arrange that matter with generosity, consideration and benefit to the children.

h It follows from what I have said that as from the date of this order the effectiveness of the order of the magistrates will cease.

3rd, 17th MAY 1973

Practice – Stay of proceedings – Jurisdiction – Medical examination of plaintiff – Examination at defendant's request – Exchange of medical reports – Reciprocity – Plaintiff agreeing to submit to examination on condition defendant supplies copy of report – Plaintiff only entitled to insist on condition if willing to supply copies of own medical reports in exchange.

The plaintiff brought an action claiming damages for personal injuries. The defendant's insurers asked for a medical examination. The plaintiff's solicitors agreed on condition that, inter alia, after the examination 'you will let us have a copy of the report'. The defendant's insurers agreed 'provided . . . that there is a full exchange of medical reports and that you are willing to furnish us with copies of all your medical evidence in return'. The plaintiffs' solicitors, however, insisted on unqualified acceptance of their terms and the defendant applied for a stay of proceedings.

Held – The defendant was entitled to the order sought. Although a plaintiff could make it a condition of submitting to a medical examination that the defendant should provide him with a copy of the report, he could only do so where he was willing to offer in exchange, on a basis of reciprocity, his own equivalent report on which he proposed to rely (see p 1012 f to h, post).

Interlocutory appeal

The defendant, Frank Burke, appealed against an order of Master Jacob made on 5th March 1973 whereby he dismissed an application by the defendant that all further proceedings in the action by the plaintiff, David Anthony McGinley, against the defendant for damages for personal injuries be stayed until the plaintiff submitted himself to a medical examination on behalf of the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Cur adv vult

17th May. BEAN J read the following judgment. This is an appeal from a refusal by Master Jacob to make an order staying all further proceedings in the a action on the ground that the plaintiff had unreasonably refused to submit himself to a medical examination on behalf of the defendant. The point raised is an interesting one on which there is no direct authority.

b The plaintiff's claim is for damages for serious personal injuries which he sustained on 29th March 1972 and which resulted in a fracture of the skull and a fracture of the spine. On 13th July 1972, before the statement of claim was served, the defendant's insurers asked for a medical examination. The plaintiff's solicitors agreed to afford facilities for a joint medical examination on four terms: (1) that it took place in the presence of their consultant; (2) that the defendant's insurers pay all costs; (3) that the name of the proposed doctor be submitted for agreement; (4) that after the examination 'you will let us have a copy of the report you have obtained in accordance with the recent direction of the Court of Appeal'.

c The defendant's insurers agreed to these terms, 'provided . . . that there is a full exchange [of medical reports] and that you are willing to furnish us with copies of all your medical evidence in return'. The plaintiff's solicitors insisted on unqualified acceptance of their four terms, with the result that the defendant took out a summons to stay the proceedings, but the master made no order. The defendant now appeals.

d It is both helpful and instructive to note the quite marked development that has taken place in recent years on the question of medical reports in personal injury actions. Provision was made in the Civil Evidence Act 1972, s 2 (3), for rules of court to enable the court in any civil proceedings to direct that one party shall disclose to the other party medical reports that it is proposed to adduce as part of his case at trial, but no rules under this section have yet been published. Until such rules are made a report which a doctor gives to a solicitor is a document protected by legal professional privilege and the other side is not entitled as of right to see it: *Worrall v Reich*², *McGuinness v Fairbairn Lawson Ltd*³. It is to be noted that in *Worrall v Reich*⁴ Morris LJ said:

' . . . in cases of personal injuries it is proper and desirable that medical reports should be exchanged to the greatest possible extent.'

f In *Edmeades v Thames Board Mills Ltd*⁵ the Court of Appeal exercised its inherent jurisdiction to grant a stay of proceedings unless and until the plaintiff submitted himself to an examination by one of six named doctors. Lord Denning MR⁶ referred to the report by Winn LJ's Committee on Personal Injuries Litigation⁷, which said:

g ' . . . we entertain no doubt that every claimant of damages for personal injuries must be bound to submit himself or herself to medical examination of a reasonable character which is reasonably required, subject, of course, to proper safeguards and to the claimant's right to object to any particular doctor. In case of need, we consider that the Court must have a power if necessary by legislation to stay the action pending the plaintiff submitting to such an examination.'

h And Lord Denning MR said⁶:

'I do not think legislation is necessary. This court has ample jurisdiction to grant a stay whenever it is just and reasonable so to do. It can, therefore, order a stay if the conduct of the plaintiff in refusing a reasonable request is such as to prevent the just determination of the cause.'

7 (1968) Cmnd 3691, para 312

These observations by Lord Denning MR were expressly approved by the Court of Appeal in *Lane v Willis*¹. There, in the course of his judgment, Sachs LJ said²:

'An order for a medical examination of any party to an action has been well said to be an "invasion of personal liberty". Accordingly, it should only be granted when it is reasonable in the interests of justice so to order. When the refusal of a medical examination is alleged to be unreasonable, the onus lies on the party who says that it is unreasonable and who applies for the order to show, on the particular facts of the case, that he is unable properly to prepare his claim (or defence) without that examination.'

The most recent case dealing with medical reports is *Clarke v Martlew*³, where it was held that fairness required that if a defendant sought to have a plaintiff medically examined any report obtained should be disclosed and accordingly the court would only order the action to be stayed for the medical examination of the plaintiff on the condition that the plaintiff was supplied with a copy of the report. But it is to be noted that the plaintiff there was willing to give the other side copies of all her own medical reports. Lord Denning MR said⁴:

'I know that, as a result of our decision today, it will mean that in practice medical reports will have to be exchanged with a view to agreement. That seems to me altogether desirable in the search for justice and the saving of expense.'

It will be seen from this review of recent authority that a defendant can now, in proper cases, require a medical examination of the plaintiff provided that he is willing to exchange medical reports with the plaintiff's advisers. What has not been the subject of a direct decision is the extent of the duty on the plaintiff's advisers where they seek a copy of the defendant's medical report as a condition of permitting the examination.

Clearly, on the present state of the law, the plaintiff's advisers are not obliged to disclose all the medical reports they have obtained. The court is only concerned with those medical reports on which the plaintiff intends to rely at trial. It seems to me that the plaintiff must at least offer reciprocity. If his advisers require to see a copy of the defendant's medical reports as a condition of a particular examination, they must be prepared to offer in exchange their own equivalent report on which they propose to rely.

In this instant appeal the plaintiff's advisers felt that they could insist on seeing the defendant's medical report immediately and then, in due course, near to the hearing date, disclose their own reports. In my judgment there must be fairness between the parties. The plaintiff can insist on seeing a medical report sought by the defendant only by offering his own report in exchange. Alternatively, the parties can agree to eventual exchange of reports before trial. Or, of course, until rules to the contrary are made, parties can refuse to disclose their reports. It follows that the fourth term sought to be imposed by the plaintiff's solicitors in this appeal was unreasonable and arose from a misunderstanding of the recent directions of the Court of Appeal. I note that the statement of claim has not yet been delivered in this action, but the injuries described in a letter before action are capable of being very grave ones or might prove to be comparatively minor. I think the defendant's advisers are entitled to assess the true nature of the injuries, even at this early stage, a and accordingly, in my view, the onus referred to by Sachs LJ in *Lane v Willis*¹ has been discharged. I would allow this appeal and make the order sought. The plaintiff is now legally aided.

Appeal allowed but order not to be enforced without further order of the court; leave to appeal.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P, SIR REGINALD GRIFFITHS AND MR ROBERT ROBERTS

f Industrial relations – Unfair industrial practice – Complaint – Procedure – Time limit – Complaint made out of time – Whether tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint – Industrial Relations Act 1971, Sch 6, para 5 (1).

g An employee was summarily dismissed by his employers with the result that his employment was effectively terminated on 29th September 1972. Until he visited his employment exchange in early November 1972 and received advice the employee was unaware of his right to present a complaint of unfair dismissal to an industrial tribunal. On 22nd November 1972 the employee presented a complaint to an industrial tribunal. The employers claimed that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint because it had not been presented before the end of the period of four weeks beginning with the effective date of the termination of his contract as required by r 2 (1)^a of the Schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972. The tribunal held, however, that the time limit did not apply since it had not been ‘practicable’, within r 2 (1), for the employee to present his complaint within the four week period and awarded the employee compensation. The employers appealed.

j Held – (i) Industrial tribunals, when considering whether it was ‘practicable’ for a complaint to be presented within the time limit, should take account of when the complainant first knew that he might make a claim for compensation for unfair

dismissal. Unless and until he had been put on enquiry it was clearly impracticable for a dismissed employee to present a claim. However, once he had been put on enquiry, the tribunal should decide whether, starting from that point of time, it was practicable for the particular complaint to be presented before the expiry of the time limit. In the instant case the employee was unaware of his right to claim compensation before the beginning of November 1972 and, in the absence of any evidence that he was put on enquiry at an earlier date, the tribunal was right in concluding that it was not practicable for his complaint to be presented within the four week period (see p 1016 h and p 1017 d, post).

(ii) It did not follow that, because it had not been practicable to present the complaint within the four week period, the tribunal was bound to entertain the claim. If the circumstances were such that a tribunal had jurisdiction to entertain a late claim, it then had a discretion whether or not to do so; in exercising that discretion, regard should be had to the intention of Parliament that claims generally should be presented within a four week period and the tribunal should consider whether the complainant had acted as swiftly as practicable in all the circumstances. On the facts, however, the tribunal could only have exercised its discretion in favour of entertaining the complaint and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 1017 e to g, post).

Per Curiam. By virtue of Sch 6, para 5 (1)^b to the Industrial Relations Act 1971, r 2 (1) of the Schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972 goes to the jurisdiction of the tribunal and is not merely a procedural bar, the benefit of which can be waived by the employer (see p 1015 f and j, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Westward Circuits Ltd against the decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman John M Shaw Esq QC) sitting in Exeter, dated 5th January 1973, that the respondent, Colin William Steward Read, had been unfairly dismissed. The appellants' ground of appeal was that by virtue of r 2 (1) of the Schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972 the respondent's complaint to the tribunal had been presented out of time. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

J Melville Williams for the respondent.

Cur adv vult

28th March. SIR JOHN DONALDSON P read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the employers against the unanimous decision of the industrial tribunal sitting in Exeter that the respondent was entitled to £600 by way a of compensation for unfair dismissal. The only ground of appeal is that the claim was out of time and that accordingly the tribunal had no jurisdiction.

^b Paragraph 5 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 1015 h, post

The respondent was employed by the appellants from 1st June 1970 as a production manager. The effective date of the termination of his employment was 29th September 1972, on which day he was summarily dismissed with four weeks' wages in lieu of notice. He presented his claim to the tribunal on 22nd November 1972 at the end of a period of 55 days beginning on the effective date of termination.

b The Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972¹ provide in r 2 (1) of the Schedule:

'In relation to proceedings on complaints under section 106 of the [Industrial Relations Act 1971], a tribunal shall not entertain such a complaint unless it is presented before the end of the period of four weeks beginning—(a) in the case of a complaint relating to dismissal, with the effective date of termination, or (b) . . . unless the tribunal is satisfied that in the circumstances it was not practicable for the complaint to be presented before the end of that period.'

The tribunal was so satisfied. It held:

d '[The respondent], on being dismissed, was most anxious to find out what the grounds were on which he had been dismissed, and for what reason it was alleged he was inefficient. He wished to clear his name of this slur. He pressed the company by telephone and letter for an explanation, which produced no result. During the first four weeks after 29th September he was not able to claim unemployment benefit because he had been given four weeks money in lieu of notice and consequently was not visiting the employment exchange where he could have obtained advice. He was not aware of his right to apply to the tribunal under the Industrial Relations Act and it was not until the beginning of November that he was advised as to his rights at the employment exchange. Consequently the delay over 28 days was really attributable to the ignorance by [the respondent] of his rights under the Act'

f The tribunal also held that r 2 (1) of the Schedule to the 1972 regulations went to its jurisdiction and was not a bar the benefit of which could be waived by the employer. This was not material either to its decision or to this appeal, since the employers at all times consistently maintained that the claim was made too late. However, it may be helpful if we say that we agree with the tribunal. The rules of procedure in the Schedule to the 1972 regulations were made under the power contained in Sch 6 to the 1971 Act, para 5 (1) of which provides:

g 'In relation to proceedings on complaints under section 106 of this Act the regulations shall also include provision precluding an industrial tribunal from entertaining such a complaint unless it is presented before the end of the period of four weeks beginning—(a) in the case of a complaint relating to dismissal, with the effective date of termination, or (b) . . . unless the tribunal is satisfied that in the circumstances it was not practicable for the complaint to be presented before the end of that period.'

A construction of the rules which treats them as procedural rather than jurisdictional would conflict with Sch 6, since it would result in the tribunal only being precluded from entertaining a late complaint if the employer took the point.

j Counsel for the appellants submitted that the tribunal had applied a subjective test of practicability and that this was wrong. In his submission the law leant against a construction which involved deciding what was a man's state of mind, for it was easy for someone to assert that he was ignorant of the law and difficult to disprove such an assertion. Counsel for the appellants submitted that practicability had to be judged in the light of factors which were objectively assessable such as physical or mental illness or absence overseas. a

Counsel for the respondent submitted that the rule expressly required the tribunal to assess practicability 'in the circumstances' and that such circumstances must include the state of the complainant's knowledge of the law. He pointed out that in the related field of workmen's compensation s 2 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 provided that, 'Proceedings... shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof...' In *Albison v Newroyd Mill Ltd*¹ the Court of Appeal, following earlier cases, had held that in applying this section the court had to answer the question 'At what time did the workman realise that he had suffered an injury by accident entitling him to compensation under the Act'. b

In *Evans v Bartlam*² Lord Atkin said: c

'For my part, I am not prepared to accept the view that there is in law any presumption that anyone, even a judge, knows all the rules and orders of the Supreme Court. The fact is that there is not, and never has been, a presumption that everyone knows the law. There is the rule that ignorance of the law does not excuse, a maxim of very different scope and application.'

The rule that ignorance of the law is no excuse is part of the criminal law of Great Britain. It means no more and no less than that a man is guilty of an offence if he does something which is prohibited by law, whether or not he knows that it is prohibited. But, although it does not excuse, ignorance of the law is a powerful mitigating factor and in appropriate circumstances may well lead to the court finding the offence proved but ordering an absolute discharge. Outside the field of the criminal law, knowledge or ignorance of the law is usually irrelevant, but in no case is there any presumption that every or any citizen knows all the law. Thus ignorance that the law imposes a duty of care does not provide any answer to a claim for damages for breach of that duty, i.e. for negligence. There are, however, exceptional cases in which knowledge of the law is relevant. The decision of the House of Lords in *Evans v Bartlam*³ shows that it may be relevant in deciding whether a man has made an election. *Albison v Newroyd Mill Ltd*¹ shows that it used to be relevant in the context of workmen's compensation claims. d

In Hammond v Haigh Castle & Co Ltd we said⁴ that members of tribunals should ask themselves: e

' "Would a jury composed of ordinary men and women employed in industry consider that in all the circumstances it was practicable for the complaint to have been presented within the time limit?" ' f

In answering this question we have no doubt that an industrial jury would take account, and rightly take account, of when the complainant first knew that he might be entitled to make a claim for compensation for unfair dismissal. We stress the word 'might' because a complainant may be put on enquiry by visits to the employment exchange, reading newspapers, gossip in the 'local' and in many other ways without actually knowing that he has such a right. Unless and until he is put on enquiry, it is clearly impracticable for a dismissed employee to present a claim. However, once he is put on enquiry the situation is changed and the tribunal has to ask itself whether, starting from that point of time, it was practicable for that particular complainant's complaint to be presented before the expiry of the 28 day period which began with the effective date of termination of the contract of employment. Clearly, the sooner g a the complainant is put on enquiry and the greater the degree of information which he then acquires, the sooner it will be practicable to present the complaint. Thus, if the employment exchange tells him of his right and gives him the appropriate form, it will be practicable to present the complaint sooner than if he merely reads in the newspapers that some other person in different circumstances has been awarded compensation for unfair dismissal.

b Let no one regard this judgment as a licence to complainants to sleep on their rights. Time is of the essence in all matters concerning industrial relations. There can be few, if any, workers who have not heard of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, but there have been times when the members of the court have wondered how many people had any idea of what it provided. However, that situation is changing and the time will come when it will be difficult, if not impossible, for a complainant to persuade any tribunal that he or she was unaware in a general way of the rights conferred c by the 1971 Act in relation to unfair dismissal. In the meantime, if any employers are worried at the prospect of being faced by late claims, the remedy is in their own hands. They need only tell dismissed employees that if they consider that they have been unfairly dismissed within the meaning of the 1971 Act, they are entitled to apply to an industrial tribunal for compensation and must do so within the specified period.

d In the light of the tribunal's conclusion of fact that the respondent was unaware of his right to claim compensation before the beginning of November 1972, and in the absence of any evidence that he was put on enquiry at some earlier date, we consider that the tribunal was right to conclude that it was not practicable for the respondent's complaint to be presented within the 28 day period. But it does not follow from this that the tribunal were bound to entertain the claim. True it is that on a literal e reading of the rule, if once the tribunal is satisfied that it was impracticable to present the claim within the limited period, it might appear that the claim could be entertained however late it was presented. We do not consider that that is the true construction of the rule. The intention both of the 1971 Act and of the rule is that claims for compensation shall be presented promptly. In our judgment, if the circumstances are such that the tribunal has jurisdiction to entertain a late claim, it then has a discretion whether or not to do so. In exercising that discretion it should have regard f to the fact that Parliament expected that claims could generally be presented within a four week period and should consider whether the complainant has acted as swiftly as practicable in all the circumstances.

In the present case the tribunal has made no reference to its ability to exercise any such discretion. However, the evidence which was accepted by the tribunal shows g that the respondent first learnt of his rights on 3rd or more probably on 9th or 10th November 1972. The claim was presented on 22nd November 1972 and the tribunal could only have exercised their discretion in favour of entertaining the claim.

Accordingly the appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Case stated

These were appeals by the defendants, Malcolm Aldus and William John Straw, by way of a case stated by justices for the county of Durham acting in and for the petty sessional division of Barnard Castle in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Barnard Castle on 30th August 1972.

On 30th June 1972 a separate information was preferred by Barry David Watson, against each of the defendants, Ronald Frank Worsley, John Moffatt, Malcolm Aldus and William John Straw, that they 'on 14th May 1972 at the parish of Winston in the county of Durham did drive a certain motor vehicle, namely, a motor cycle on a certain road called the A67 Barnard Castle to Gainford Road, in a manner which was dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the nature, condition and use of the road, and the amount of traffic which was actually at the time or which might reasonably have been expected to be on the road, contrary to s 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1960'.

The justices heard the informations on 30th August 1972 when all the defendants and the prosecutor were legally represented. On the charge being put to the defendants each of them asked for summary trial and pleaded not guilty. Application for each of the defendants to be tried separately was made by the defendants' solicitor who cited in support the following cases: *Brangwynne v Evans*¹, *R v Ashbourne Justices, ex parte Naden*², *R v Hadwen*³ and *Taylor's Central Garages v Roper*⁴. That a application was resisted by the prosecutor's solicitor who outlined the case against the defendants and stated that what was complained of was not so much what the defendants had done as individuals, but what they had done collectively, emphasising that it was the joint action of the defendants which had caused the danger. In support he cited the following authorities: *R v Lipscombe, ex parte Biggins*¹, *Wells v Cheyney*², *R v Gridland*³ and *Paul v Summerhayes*⁴. The justices rejected the application for separate trials.

b The justices found as facts the evidence given by various witnesses, who had been driving cars on the road from Barnard Castle to Gainford on 14th May 1972, to the effect that four motor cyclists had been travelling along the road in the same direction at a slow speed, sometimes abreast, sometimes wandering across the road and thereby preventing motorists from overtaking or making it difficult for them to do so. One of the witnesses complained to a police officer and gave him the registration numbers of the motor cycles. Shortly afterwards the defendants were stopped and interviewed by police officers who informed them that they would be reported for consideration of the question whether they should be prosecuted for dangerous driving.

c Each of the defendants gave evidence on oath; each denied that they had driven dangerously and each denied that they had deliberately prevented anyone from overtaking; they stated that they had never driven two abreast and none of them could remember any untoward event whilst they were driving on the Barnard Castle to Gainford Road on 14th May 1972.

d After retiring the justices returned and announced that the information against each of the defendants for driving in a dangerous manner was dismissed, but they directed that an information be preferred forthwith against each of the defendants for driving without reasonable consideration in accordance with s 3 (2) of the Road Traffic Act 1960.

e The defendants were thereupon each charged separately that on 14th May 1972 at the parish of Winston, in the county of Durham he drove a certain motor vehicle, namely, a motor cycle, on a certain road called the A67 Barnard Castle to Gainford Road, without reasonable consideration for other road users, contrary to s 3 of the Road Traffic Act 1960. Each of the defendants pleaded not guilty.

f The justice then retired to give the defendants' solicitor time to take instructions. They returned and the defendants' solicitor announced that he did not wish to seek an adjournment, that he did not wish to re-examine any of the witnesses, and that the defendants did not wish to give evidence. He made no application for separate trials but further addressed the court, stating that there was no evidence on which the court could convict each defendant as an individual and that as they were separately charged the case against each of them should be dismissed.

g The justices found each of the defendants guilty of driving without reasonable consideration for other road users. They fined each defendant £15 and ordered that each of them pay £10.04 costs and that their licences should be endorsed.

h The question for the opinion of the High Court was: having regard to the fact that each of the defendants was charged separately with an identical offence arising out of the same set of facts and that it was the joint action of the defendants which caused the offences were the justices right to refuse the defendants separate trials and to find each of them guilty of driving without reasonable consideration for other road users?

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the county of Durham sitting at Barnard Castle in respect of their adjudication on 30th August 1972. Initially on that day they had before them four separate informations preferred against four individuals, two of whom are appellants before this court today, and each of those informations alleged that on 14th May 1972 at a place there stated the defendant in question drove a motor vehicle on a road in a manner which was dangerous to the public. a

The story unfolded by the evidence, of which there was a good deal, was that these four defendants responding on separate summonses to separate informations, had been together on this road on their motor bicycles, and they had been a very considerable annoyance to the other road users, because they would drive along in a loose formation, sometimes manoeuvring slowly, sometimes speeding up, they would sway from one side to the other, although emphasis is laid by counsel for the appellants on the fact that they never crossed the white line. In short, other traffic coming up behind wishing to pass at a faster speed was prevented from doing so by the tactics of these four defendants on their motor bicycles. b

When the matter first came before the justices there was an application for separate trials, and that application was rejected, so initially the evidence was heard, with the four defendants having their respective informations tried together. The justices retired, and after considering the matter they returned into court, and they said that the information in each case for dangerous driving was dismissed. However, they directed that an information against each of the defendants for driving without reasonable consideration be preferred forthwith in accordance with s 3 of the Road Traffic Act 1960. That seems an exceedingly sensible idea for the justices to have had, because on the face of it, it might have been difficult to sustain an allegation of dangerous driving, but anything which more accurately fitted the offence of driving without due consideration, it is difficult to describe. So I would respectfully commend the justices for having given that direction, but they directed there should be four informations as there had been on the first charge of dangerous driving. Having so directed they retired to give the defendants and their solicitor an opportunity to consider the matter. c

When the justices came back into court again, they were told by the defendants' solicitor that he did not want an adjournment, he did not want to re-examine any of the witnesses, that the defendants did not wish to give evidence, and there was no application for separate trials, but the solicitor, perhaps not without skill, sought to save something from what then must have appeared a wreck of a case by submitting to the justices that they could not convict any defendant as an individual, and as they were separately charged the informations should be dismissed against each one; the basis of that submission was that there was no evidence on which any one as an individual could have been charged with this behaviour. d

The justices did not accept that submission, so they convicted on the lesser charge of driving without due consideration for other road users. The only point which is taken before us, which counsel for the appellants accepts without any hesitation as being a highly technical point, is that there was no jurisdiction to try together the four informations which were directed to be laid by the justices in the absence of consent of the defendants. He concedes that it would be possible for the justices to have ordered a single information charging the four defendants jointly, and that if they had done so, of course, the four individuals could have been tried jointly and together. But he says, as a matter of technicality, four informations having been preferred and no consent having been obtained from the defendants to try those four informations together, then the conviction was an irregular and unlawful conviction. e

Strangely enough, there is far less authority on this point than I for my part would have expected to find; indeed, there is really very little. One looks first at *Brangwynne v Evans*¹ which dealt with a different though allied point where two f

a informations were laid against the same individual. The headnote accurately states the view of this court when the trial of two informations against an individual was being challenged. It says¹:

b 'It has always been a principle of law that a defendant in a magistrates' court can only be called on to answer one charge at a time unless he consents, either expressly or impliedly, to informations being heard together; accordingly, a magistrates' court should never proceed to hear two or more informations at the same time without expressly asking the defendant whether he consents to that course.'

c That remains authority for the proposition that if one is considering two informations against the same person it is necessary to have his consent before they are tried together. It does not in itself answer our problem, which is whether you can try together two individuals against whom separate informations have been laid, the informations alleging the same offence committed in the same circumstances.

d We have been referred to a number of other cases which cast such light as there is to be cast on this problem, but nowhere is there any authority cited to us which authorises justices to do as was done in this case. I would not readily assume that the *Brangwynne v Evans*² rule necessarily applies when you have two separate defendants, but there is nothing else in the authorities to which we have been referred which I can find in any sense to be a reliable authority for the proposition that two or more defendants can be tried together without their consent. If I may say so, the point was made at its clearest to me in argument when Ashworth J asked counsel to say where the authority came from that one could try two or more people together. After all, on the face of it, it seems a thing which would require authority. e One thinks from first principles that two defendants would normally be tried separately, and if they are to be tried together one would expect to find some authority justifying it to be done.

f I shall not take time to refer to the relatively restricted references which we have found in the books on this subject, and I am left at the end of the argument facing the fact that I can find no authority for what was done, and accepting that there ought to be authority if indeed it is to be done. Accordingly, it seems to me that the justices, although I have every sympathy with them, were wrong in the first instance, that as they had separate informations they were wrong in trying to deal with the matter jointly without the consent of the parties from the beginning.

g Of course, it may be that on the special facts of this case when the matter came up the second time, that is to say when the matter had to be considered on revised informations, that it may be said in the circumstances of this case that the defendants had in fact assented to the joint disposal of their cases. I have thought about this, and can see that there are at any rate the germs of an argument that in the particular circumstances of this case assent by the defendants might be implied. It is to counsel for the prosecutor's credit, I think, that he does not really press us to adopt that view, and on reflection I do not think it would be a fair and proper view to take h on the facts of this case. Accordingly, although the grounds are highly technical I have come to the conclusion that counsel for the appellants' submission is right, that these convictions are irregular, and that they will have to be quashed.

Local authority – Land – Power to sell land – Land subject to charitable trust – Statutory power – Whether power to dispose of land subject to charitable trust – Local Government Act 1933, s 165.

In 1930 the owner of a mansion house and park decided to make the property over to the local urban district council as a memorial to members of her family. The conveyance recited her desire to give the property to the urban district council ‘for the purposes and upon the trusts hereinafter mentioned as a memorial . . .’ The deed described in some detail the purposes for which the property was to be used; the parkland was ‘to be used as a Public Park or Pleasure Grounds’. In 1968 the county council embarked on plans for widening a road adjoining the park and in 1970 the urban district council entered into a deed of conveyance whereby, as beneficial owners, they conveyed to the county council a strip of land adjacent to the road forming part of the park. The plaintiffs, who were inhabitants of the urban district, issued an originating summons seeking a declaration that the park was subject to a charitable trust, a declaration that the part of the park conveyed to the county council was still subject to that trust and an injunction to restrain the use thereof as a public highway. The defendants to the summons were the urban district council and the county council (‘the local authorities’); the Attorney-General was subsequently added as a defendant. The local authorities issued a notice of motion seeking an order, under RSC Ord 18, r 19, that the summons be struck out, contending, inter alia, that on its true construction the 1930 conveyance did not create a charitable trust and that, in any event, the plaintiffs had no locus standi to bring the proceedings. Counsel for the Attorney-General indicated that, if it were held that the plaintiffs had no locus standi, he would apply for the Attorney-General to be substituted as plaintiff under RSC Ord 15, r 6 (2).

Held – (i) There was at least a strong prima facie case for asserting the existence of a charitable trust (see p 1028 c to e, post).

(ii) The Local Government Act 1933, s 165^a, did not empower a local authority to dispose of land held on charitable trusts. It followed that the strip of land conveyed

^a Section 165, so far as material, provides: ‘A local authority may . . . (a) sell any land which they may possess and which is not required for the purpose for which it was acquired or is being used . . .’

a to the county council prima facie remained subject to the charitable trust affecting the park (see p 1028 j, and p 1029 b, post).

(iii) The plaintiffs, however, had no locus standi to bring the proceedings. No one, save the Attorney-General, was entitled to maintain an action against supposed trustees to establish the existence of a charitable trust; nor could anyone except the trustees of the charity or the Attorney-General bring proceedings to recover charity property from a third person. Furthermore it was not possible to maintain b such a suit on the ground that the charity was a local one and that the persons seeking to maintain the suit were persons of that locality and thus potential recipients of benefits under the trust. The only case where inhabitants of a locality could bring proceedings in respect of a local charity was in cases where the proceedings were 'charity proceedings' within s 28^b of the Charities Act 1960; such proceedings did not, however, include proceedings which had as one of their objects the construction c of a conveyance for the purpose of determining whether the conveyance was effective to create a charitable trust (see p 1031 f and p 1032 e to g, post); Re Belling (deceased), London Borough of Enfield v Public Trustee [1967] 1 All ER 105 applied.

(iv) It was, however, open to the court to substitute the Attorney-General as d plaintiff. It was no objection that the application by the Attorney-General should have been made at an earlier stage of the proceedings for it could not really have been made before the decision that the plaintiffs had no cause of action. Furthermore it was immaterial that the substitution would mean replacing two incompetent plaintiffs by another person who was sustaining a character entirely different from that which the plaintiffs had sought to sustain. Accordingly the Attorney-General would be substituted as plaintiff and the motion to strike out the summons would e be dismissed (see p 1034 a b and d, post); Hughes v Pump House Hotel Co Ltd (No 2) [1902] 2 KB 485 applied.

Motion

On 13th October 1972 the plaintiffs, Rosalie Hauxwell and Iris Marion Naylor, inhabitants of Barton-upon-Humber, applied to the Charity Commissioners under the Charities Act 1960, s 28, for an order authorising proceedings against the defendants, Barton-upon-Humber Urban District Council and the County Council of Lincoln, Parts of Lindsey ('the local authorities'); the commissioners, although of opinion that the material property was held on a charitable trust, refused a certificate under s 28 (2) of the 1960 Act because the proceedings proposed were not, in their view, 'charity proceedings' within the meaning of s 28. On 1st January 1973 the plaintiffs signed a statement under RSC Ord 108, r 3, in which they sought leave pursuant to s 28 (5) of the Charities Act 1960 and RSC Ord 108, r 3. On 3rd January 1973 the plaintiffs issued an originating summons against the local authorities; by their summons, the plaintiffs sought: (i) a declaration that a conveyance dated 17th July 1930 and made h a between Clare Ermyntrude Magdalen Wright Ramsden and the district council, so far as the same related to a property known as 'Baysgarth Park', established a charitable trust (of a local nature) with a permanent endowment (namely Baysgarth Park) of which the district council was the sole trustee; (ii) a declaration that any disposition of Baysgarth Park or any part thereof made other than by the district council conveying as trustee (pursuant to the Settled Land Act 1925, s 29) and pursuant to an order of the court or of the commissioners (under the Charities Act 1960, s 29 (1)) constituted the grantee under such disposition a constructive trustee of Baysgarth Park or the part thereof comprised in the disposition as the case might be and that such constructive trustee held on all the trusts and subject to all the provisions of the 1930 conveyance so far as they affected or related to Baysgarth Park; (iii) a declaration that any part of Baysgarth Park conveyed or purportedly conveyed to the county council by the district council whether at the best price reasonably obtainable or with or without consideration and whether the district council conveyed or purported to convey as trustee or beneficial owner or otherwise was in the events which had happened still held on all the trusts and subject to all the obligations contained in the 1930 conveyance so far as they affected or related to Baysgarth Park; the plaintiffs further sought, as against the county council only (iv) an injunction restraining the county council by its members, officers, servants, agents or otherwise howsoever from using or threatening to use Baysgarth Park or any part thereof as or for a public highway or any other purpose other than as a public park or pleasure ground for ever open and unbuilt on except in the manner provided by the 1930 conveyance and in all respects on the trusts and subject to the obligations of the 1930 conveyance. On an ex parte motion by the plaintiffs, on 4th January 1973, May J, the vacation judge, ordered that the local authorities and each of them be restrained until after 12th January 1973 or until further order in the meantime from doing (whether by their officers or by their servants, contractors or agents or any of them or otherwise howsoever) the following acts or any of them, that is to say using or threatening to use or constructing or commencing to construct or undertaking preliminary works of any kind within that area of land in Barton-upon-Humber known as Baysgarth Park with a view to the use of such land or any part thereof as or for or as part of a public highway of any kind or for any other purpose than as a public park or pleasure ground for ever open and unbuilt on except in manner provided by the 1930 conveyance and in all respects on the trusts and subject to the obligations imposed by the conveyance. On 23rd January the originating summons was amended by adding the Attorney-General as third defendant. By notice of motion dated 23rd January 1973, the local authorities sought an order under RSC Ord 18, r 19, that the originating summons be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. The facts are set out in the judgment.

8th March. BRIGHTMAN J read the following judgment. The plaintiffs in this action are Mrs Hauxwell and Mrs Naylor. They are inhabitants of the town of Barton-upon-Humber in the county of Lincoln. The first defendants are the Barton-upon-Humber Urban District Council. The second defendants go under the name of 'the County Council of Lincoln, Parts of Lindsey'. The subject-matter of the dispute is a recreation ground known as Baysgarth Park near the centre of the town. It is an attractive area of grassland and with a large number of trees. It contains a heated outdoor swimming-pool, a bowling green, children's swings and roundabouts and a miniature railway. No doubt it adds greatly to the amenities of Barton-upon-Humber, and is much valued by the townsfolk.

A public highway known as Brigg Road runs north and south. This forms the western boundary of Baysgarth Park. There is also a narrow highway running east and west known as Preston Lane, which forms the northern boundary of the park. Baysgarth Park extends over $14\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land. To the north-east of the park is a piece of land extending to $2\frac{1}{4}$ acres, which is the site of a mansion house known as Baysgarth. Another roadway cuts across the park and gives direct access from Brigg Road to the mansion house.

The park and the mansion house were originally in the ownership of a local family called Taylor. The property came into the ownership of Mrs Ramsden, a member of that family. In the year 1930 Mrs Ramsden decided to make the property over to the Barton-upon-Humber Urban District Council as a memorial to her father and mother, and to her brother George who had been killed in action in the first world war. The conveyance to the urban district council is dated 17th July 1930. It recited her desire to give the property to the urban district council 'for the purposes and upon the trusts hereinafter mentioned as a memorial', and so on. There is then a recital that the urban district council were—

'desirous of acquiring the said hereditaments for the purposes of the Public Health Acts 1875 to 1925 and have agreed to accept such gift upon the terms and conditions hereinafter contained.'

Clause 1 of the deed conveyed to the urban district council first the mansion house and grounds (the $2\frac{1}{4}$ acre site) and secondly the park (the $14\frac{1}{2}$ acres site). The property first conveyed was expressed to include a right of way for the urban district council and their licensees over the roadway between the mansion house and Brigg Road. The property secondly conveyed included that roadway as well as the park itself. The wording of the habendum is as follows: 'TO HOLD the same unto the Council in fee simple for the purposes hereinafter appearing'.

Clause 3 of the conveyance is of prime importance. It is divided into two sub-clauses. Sub-clause (1) reads:

'The premises hereinbefore firstly described are conveyed to and taken by the Council primarily for use as offices for the transaction of the business of the Council and that of their officers and servants but until such time as the Council shall require the said premises for use as offices as aforesaid the Council may use the same for the purposes of a Hospital with housing accommodation for officers or servants employed at the Hospital or for any other purpose within their powers under the Public Health Acts 1875 to 1925 or any statutory modification or amendment thereof or the Council may let the same and apply the net profits received therefrom in relief of the rates of the District And similarly if at any time it shall be unnecessary to retain the said premises for use as offices the Council may use and apply the same for any purpose within their powers and subject to such sanction or consent (if any) as may be necessary.'

Sub-clause (2) reads:

'The premises hereinbefore secondly described are conveyed to and taken by the Council to be used as a Public Park or Pleasure Grounds and they shall for ever hereafter be kept open and unbuilt upon except that buildings suitable for Park and recreation purposes may be erected thereon and provided that the Council may if they think fit set apart any portion of the said premises not exceeding in the whole one half thereof to be used for the purpose of cricket football or other game and recreations under Section 69 of the Public Health Act 1925 and the Council may accordingly as to the land so set apart exercise any of the powers of the last named section.'

a Clause 5 (6) was expressed to confer power on the council to—

‘make byelaws for the regulation of the said Mansion House and Park Land and such byelaws may apply separately to the Mansion House and the Park Land or to both in common.’

b In or about the year 1968 the second defendants, the county council, embarked on plans for widening Preston Lane. For this purpose it was considered necessary to acquire a strip of land on both the north and the south side of Preston Lane. On 18th May 1970 the urban district council entered into a deed of conveyance with the county council. By cl 1, in consideration of £10 paid to the urban district council, the urban district council as beneficial owners conveyed to the county council a strip of land adjacent to Preston Lane and forming part of Baysgarth Park and of the grounds of the mansion house.

c The townspeople got wind of the plan to slice off part of Baysgarth Park for road widening. On 24th February 1971 the plaintiffs’ solicitors wrote a polite but indignant letter to the clerk to the urban district council. The clerk to the council responded on 8th April with a letter of explanation in which he said, in relation to the 1930 conveyance:

d ‘The Deed created no trust and the Council, under the terms of the Deed and under the Public Health Acts and other legislation, are solely responsible for the administration of the property.’

The plaintiffs’ solicitors then wrote a letter of protest to the county council. The correspondence continued almost to the end of 1972, the urban district council and the county council maintaining throughout their view that the strip of land forming part of Baysgarth Park was unaffected by any trusts. On 13th October the plaintiffs applied to the Charity Commissioners under s 28 of the Charities Act 1960 for an order authorising proceedings. The secretary replied on 31st October stating that the commissioners were of the opinion that the trust declared by cl 3 (2) of the 1930 conveyance was a charitable trust, but that they considered that they had no jurisdiction because the proposed proceedings were not ‘charity proceedings’ within the meaning of s 28.

f On 3rd January 1973 the plaintiffs issued an originating summons. This seeks a declaration that Baysgarth Park is subject to a charitable trust; a declaration that the part of Baysgarth Park conveyed to the county council is still subject to such trust; and an injunction to restrain the use thereof as a public highway. No claim is made in respect of the site of the mansion house or the strip of land taken from the grounds of the mansion house for road widening. Notice of motion seeking an interim injunction was served on the first and second defendants on or about 4th January. Interim relief was granted by the vacation judge ex parte on that day. On 23rd January the originating summons was amended by adding Her Majesty’s Attorney-General as a defendant. On the same day the other defendants, for their part, issued a notice of motion seeking an order, under RSC Ord 18, r 19, that the originating summons be struck out as disclosing no cause of action.

g The first submission of counsel for the local authorities was that the plaintiffs have no locus standi since they are in effect seeking by these proceedings to have determined whether or not the park is held on a charitable trust. The plaintiffs were not, it was submitted, the proper persons to make such an application to the court. The only proper plaintiff in a case where there is a bona fide dispute as to the existence of a charitable trust is the Attorney-General. I will return to this submission later.

j Counsel for the local authorities also submitted that there was no prima facie case for concluding that the park was subject to a charitable trust. He conceded, for the purposes only of this motion, that a provision worded in the manner of cl 3 (2) of the 1930 conveyance was capable of constituting a charitable trust. He submitted, however, that on the true construction of the 1930 conveyance as a whole no such trust was created. He pointed to the recital that the urban district council desired to acquire the property for the purposes of the Public Health Acts 1875 to 1925, and he referred me to s 164 of the former Act and s 69 of the latter Act, which deal with the acquisition, use and maintenance of recreational land by local authorities. He submitted that the recital was a clear indication that the urban district council intended to acquire the land for its general purposes under those Acts.

I do not intend to reach a firm decision on either of the motions whether there is or is not a valid charitable trust affecting Baysgarth Park. That question has not yet been fully debated, and counsel for the local authorities has indicated to me that at the trial of the action he wishes to expand the submissions which he has made on the law applicable to recreational charities. I am, however, satisfied that I ought to accept the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs, supported by counsel for the Attorney-General, and approach both motions on the basis that there is at least a strong prima facie case for asserting the existence of a charitable trust. My reasons are as follows. The conveyance recited the grantor's desire that the property should be conveyed 'for the purposes and upon the trusts hereinafter mentioned'. It was recited that the urban district council had 'agreed to accept such gift upon the terms and conditions hereinafter contained'. The habendum was expressed to be in favour of the urban district council 'in fee simple for the purposes hereinafter appearing'. The wording of cl 3 (2), which I have already read, is consistent with the imposition of a trust. Also, if both the park and the mansion house were to be the absolute property of the urban district council unencumbered by any trust, it is difficult to perceive the reason for granting the urban district council a right of way over the park between the mansion house and Brigg Road. A person does not need a grant of a right of way to enable him to pass over his own land.

On the basis that a charitable trust exists, it was submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs and the Attorney-General that the conveyance of 1970 to the county council was ineffective to pass the beneficial ownership of the strip required for road widening because the county council clearly had notice of the charitable trust and neither an order of the court nor of the Charity Commissioners was obtained as required by s 29 (1) of the Charities Act 1960. It would seem clear that the park is part of the 'permanent endowment' of the charity, assuming that a charitable trust exists.

Counsel for the local authorities, however, submitted that even if the park were subject to a charitable trust, the county council had acquired a good title to the strip free from any such trust. He relied on s 165 of the Local Government Act 1933. This empowers a local authority, with the consent of the Minister, to sell any land which they possess and which is not required for the purpose for which it was acquired or is being used. The strip of land was required for road widening and was not, counsel for the local authorities said, required for the park, the recreational purposes of which would remain unimpaired. This section, he submitted, applied as much to land held by a local authority for charitable purposes as to land held for other purposes of the authority. He contrasted s 170 of the Act, which uses identical language to confer comparable power on a parish council with the consent of the parish meeting, but in this case there is an express proviso against dealing with land held for charitable purposes without (as originally enacted) such consent or approval as was required by the Charitable Trusts Acts 1853 to 1925. The absence of a similar proviso in s 165 indicates, submitted counsel for the local authorities, that charity land could be dealt with under that section. Admittedly, the consent of the Minister was not obtained, but under s 29 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1959 the county council as purchasers were not concerned with the absence of such consent.

Despite the contrast between s 165 and s 170 of the Local Government Act 1933, I am not satisfied that s 165 empowers a local authority, with the consent of the Minister, to dispose of land held on charitable trusts. Such a construction would lead to a surprising result under s 166. This enacts that capital money received by a local

a authority under s 165 shall be applied in such manner as the Minister may approve towards the discharge of any debt of the local authority or otherwise for any purpose for which capital money may properly be applied—words which to my mind presuppose that the property sold was held beneficially by the local authority. Furthermore, s 179 (d) of the Act provides that nothing in Part VII of the Act (which includes s 165) shall authorise the disposal of land by a local authority in breach of any trust, covenant or agreement binding on the authority: see *Laverstock Property Co Ltd v Peterborough Corpn*¹. I accordingly reach the prima facie conclusion that the strip of land conveyed to the county council remains subject to the charitable trust affecting the park. In these circumstances I would grant the plaintiffs the interlocutory relief which they seek against both the local authorities if the plaintiffs have a locus standi in this action.

c I turn now to the submission of counsel for the local authorities that the plaintiffs have no locus standi to bring these proceedings and that the originating summons should therefore be struck out. As already mentioned, the plaintiffs applied to the Charity Commissioners under s 28 of the Charities Act 1960 for authority to bring these proceedings; this was refused for lack of jurisdiction to grant any such authority, ie s 28 of the Charities Act did not apply. Counsel for the local authorities relies on Re Belling (decd), *London Borough of Enfield v Public Trustee*², and also on the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in *Attorney-General (on the relation of McWhirter) v Independent Broadcasting Authority*³.

d Section 28 of the Charities Act 1960 provides, by sub-s (1), that what are called 'charity proceedings' may be taken with reference to a charity by the following plaintiffs (additionally to the Attorney-General), namely, the charity itself, or any of the trustees of the charity, or a person interested in the charity, or any two or more inhabitants of the area of the charity if it is a local charity, but not by any other person. It is not in dispute that Baysgarth Park, if it is a charity, is a 'local charity' within the meaning of s 45 (1), and on the same hypothesis that the plaintiffs are inhabitants of the area of that charity. Subsections (2) and (5) of s 28 provide that (subject to qualifications not material for present purposes) no charity proceedings shall be entertained or proceeded with in any court unless the taking of the proceedings is authorised by the Charity Commissioners or by a judge of the High Court attached to the Chancery Division. 'Charity proceedings' are defined in s 28 (8) as—e 'proceedings in any court in England or Wales brought under the court's jurisdiction with respect to charities, or brought under the court's jurisdiction with respect to trusts in relation to the administration of a trust for charitable purposes.'

g The facts in Re Belling (decd), *London Borough of Enfield v Public Trustee*² were these. The testator had acted as his own draftsman of a document which was admitted to probate as a codicil to his will. This codicil contained observations, to use a neutral expression, relating to the use of his property known as Owls Hall Farm at Enfield in Essex for a technical training college. The Enfield London Borough Council, which was the local education authority for Enfield, took the view that it was the body designated by the testator in the codicil as a potential recipient of his bounty for charitable educational purposes. The executors communicated with the Treasury Solicitor, who indicated that the Attorney-General considered that the codicil had no dispositive effect and did not create any charitable trust. Thereupon the executors entered into a contract for the sale of Owls Hall Farm on the basis that it formed part of the testator's residuary estate. Shortly thereafter the borough council issued a writ for a declaration that on the true construction of the codicil Owls Hall Farm was held on charitable trusts for the foundation and endowment of a scientific and technical college at Enfield, and moved for an interim order to restrain the executors from conveying the farm to the purchasers. For the purposes of the motion the learned judge assumed, as indeed counsel for the executors conceded, that the codicil was not so manifestly ineffective to create a charitable trust that the executors could properly deal with the property without regard to the codicil if a request to seek a decision as to the effect of the codicil were made by someone with a locus standi in the matter. The real question on the motion, said Pennycuik J, was whether the borough council had such locus standi. The learned judge concluded as follows¹:

'In this connexion the Attorney-General acts on behalf of the Sovereign and in the ordinary course the Attorney-General takes whatever steps may be necessary, including the institution or defence of proceedings by originating summons, for the construction of a will alleged to create a charitable trust. On this point I refer to *Strickland v Weldon*², where PEARSON, J., said: "The Attorney-General is the only person who can really represent a charity and sue on its behalf . . ." For a concise statement of principle I refer to 4 HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (3rd Edn.) 446, para. 926, where it says: "As a rule the Attorney-General is a necessary party to all actions relating to charities. It is the duty of the Queen, as parens patriae, to protect property devoted to charitable uses, and that duty is executed by the Attorney-General as the officer who represents the Crown for all forensic purposes. He represents the beneficial interest, in other words the objects, of the charity." No case has been cited to me in which anyone, other than the Attorney-General, has been admitted to institute proceedings of this type and it is difficult to see how, apart from some statutory provision, anyone other than the Attorney-General could so assume the mantle of the Sovereign.'

Counsel for the applicants advanced an alternative contention based on s 28 of the Charities Act 1960. It appears that the borough council had in fact applied under s 28 (2) for authority to bring proceedings, but the application had been refused. The borough council invited the judge to treat as before him an application to a High Court judge under s 28 (5) for leave to bring proceedings, notwithstanding the refusal of the Charity Commissioners. The judge decided as follows³:

'It seems to me that the definition in sub-s. (8) does not cover proceedings by way of the construction of a will in order to determine whether a provision in the will is effective to create a charitable trust. Such proceedings are brought neither under the court's jurisdiction as to charities nor under the court's jurisdiction with respect to trusts in relation to the administration of a trust for charitable purposes. This view derives support from a number of decisions under s. 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, which was the statutory predecessor, albeit in entirely different terms, of s. 28 of the Act of 1960. It was well established under s. 17 of the Act of 1853 that the section related exclusively to administration . . .'

The learned judge continued later⁴:

'Here, it seems to me, if the council had any locus standi it could have brought these proceedings without any leave under s. 28; conversely, if it has not a locus standi the requisite authority cannot be conferred under s. 28.'

There is similarly before me an application under s 28 (5) for leave to take these present proceedings, and to extend the time allowed under RSC Ord 108, r 3 (2), for making such an application.

a In the McWhirter case¹, on which counsel for the local authorities also relied, the plaintiff brought an action against a statutory broadcasting authority to restrain the authority from broadcasting a television film on the ground that the authority would be acting in breach of its statutory obligations. The question arose whether Mr McWhirter had any locus standi to bring such action, as distinct from an action by the Attorney-General ex officio or by the Attorney-General acting ex relatione.

b It was held by the Court of Appeal that Mr McWhirter had no locus standi, since the only proper plaintiff was the Attorney-General suing on behalf of the public as a whole, and not Mr McWhirter or any other private individual. Lord Denning MR added²:

‘... in the last resort, if the Attorney-General refuses leave in a proper case, or improperly or unreasonably delays in giving leave, or his machinery works too slowly, then a member of the public, who has a sufficient interest, can himself apply to the court itself.’

c He said later³:

‘But this, I would emphasise, is only in the last resort when there is no other remedy reasonably available to secure that the law is obeyed.’

d I may add in parenthesis that on no basis could it be said that the plaintiffs in the case before me brought proceedings in their own names as a last resort.

There are, therefore, three questions before me in connection with the locus standi of the plaintiffs. First, whether the proceedings are ‘charity proceedings’ within the meaning of s 28, so that I have jurisdiction to give leave for the proceedings to be brought. If not, the second question is whether the plaintiffs can nonetheless act as e plaintiffs in this action because the charity is a local charity and they are inhabitants of the locality. If that question is also answered in the negative, the third question is whether these proceedings should be struck out on the ground that the plaintiffs are incompetent to bring them.

As regards the first question, there is no relevant distinction between the case before me and *Re Belling (decd), London Borough of Enfield v Public Trustee*⁴. In both cases

f there was a bona fide dispute whether a charitable trust had been declared. In both cases the persons in whom the property was vested proposed to deal with that property in a manner which would be inconsistent with the charitable trust said to affect the property. I therefore conclude that the Charity Commissioners were correct in refusing leave under s 28. These are not charity proceedings within that section.

As regards the second question, counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that, in the g case of a local charity, the inhabitants of the locality have a locus standi to sue in their own names without the intervention of the Attorney-General, or alternatively, with the Attorney-General as defendant. He referred me to two cases. *Re Bedford Charity (Masters, etc)*⁵ (the hearing of which took place in 1818 and 1819) was a case of an ancient charity that provided, inter alia, marriage portions for poor maidens of the town of Bedford. Sheba Lyon had been rejected as a potential recipient of a portion

h because she was of the Jewish persuasion. The question at issue was whether persons of the Jewish faith were eligible to benefit from the charity. A petition was presented under the Charities Procedure Act 1812 by Sheba and her father and another inhabitant of Bedford, and by a number of elders of two London synagogues. In the end, it did not become necessary for the locus standi of the petitioners to be pronounced upon because in the meantime the trustees of the charity presented their own petition

i for the construction of the trusts. In answer to that petition it was declared that Jewish persons were not objects of the charity, having regard to numerous indications to the contrary in the terms of the charitable trust. However, in the course of argument, Lord Eldon LC said¹:

'What interest in the question have the gentlemen of the synagogue, who join in the petition? Every person possessing the character of an inhabitant of Bedford, and describing himself as an object of the charity, is entitled to apply to the Court; but how can I hear persons representing the synagogue?' a b

Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on this passage to assist his proposition that the plaintiffs as inhabitants of the locality were entitled to make application to this court in order to establish the existence of the charity and to restrain improper dealings with the charity property. Section 28 of the Charities Act 1960, which provides that the 1812 Act shall cease to have effect, to some extent replaces it. Lord Eldon LC's observations were, it was said, still appropriate. Counsel for the plaintiffs also referred me to *Attorney-General v Magdalen College, Oxford*² decided in 1854. One point which arose in that case was whether the inhabitants of a parish, without the assistance of the Attorney-General, could have maintained a suit to recover the property of a local charity which had been improperly alienated. There are certain observations³ in the earlier part of Sir John Romilly MR's judgment which might seem to suggest that the churchwardens of the parish could have sued in their capacity as inhabitants of the parish. But in the end the question was answered in the negative⁴ so that the case does not seem to assist counsel for the plaintiffs. c d

I am able to discern nothing in the cases which have been cited to me to indicate that anyone save the Attorney-General is entitled to maintain an action against supposed trustees to establish the existence of a charitable trust, or that anyone except the Attorney-General or the trustees of the charity can bring proceedings to recover charity property from a third person, or that persons are capable of maintaining such a suit on the ground that the charity is a local one and that they are persons of that locality, who are thus potential recipients of benefits under the trust. The only case, as it seems to me, where the inhabitants of a locality can bring proceedings in respect of a local charity, is where the proceedings are charity proceedings within the meaning of s 28. Such proceedings do not include proceedings which have as one of their objects the construction of a conveyance for the purpose of determining whether the conveyance was effective to create a charitable trust. I therefore conclude that the plaintiffs have no locus standi. e f

It does not, however, follow that the proceedings ought, on that account, to be now struck out. Counsel for the Attorney-General, who supported the submission of counsel for the local authorities that the plaintiffs have no locus standi, indicated that if I held in his favour on the issue of the existence of a charitable trust, and if I also decided in his favour on the issue of the plaintiffs' lack of locus standi, he would make an application that the Attorney-General be substituted for the plaintiffs under RSC Ord 15, r 6 (2). Counsel for the Attorney-General referred me to *Hughes v Pump House Hotel Co Ltd (No 2)*⁵, a decision on the former RSC Ord 16, r, 2, which is now superseded by RSC Ord 15, r 6 (2). The headnote reads as follows: g h

'Where an action has, through a bona fide mistake, been commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff, the fact that the original plaintiff has no cause of action does not take away the jurisdiction of the Court to order the substitution of another person as plaintiff.' i a It appears to me that under that rule I have jurisdiction at the instance of the Attorney-General to strike him out as a defendant and to substitute him as a plaintiff in the place of the existing plaintiffs. Indeed, counsel for the local authorities told me that he did not feel able to argue against the exercise of such a jurisdiction in a proper case. I find nothing in the decision of the Court of Appeal in the McWhirter case¹ which would preclude my making such an order. If, therefore, counsel for the Attorney-General now makes such an application, I will hear argument whether

b I ought or ought not to accede to it. I am conscious that if I do exercise the jurisdiction, the end result will be that persons who have no locus standi to bring proceedings to establish the existence of a charitable trust, or to protect charity property from an innocent but wrongful depredation, will nevertheless have started an action, brought interlocutory proceedings and, if an injunction is granted, gained their interim purpose. They will have been able to do this, although having no locus

c standi, because the Attorney-General is before the court as a defendant to the action and a respondent to the motion, and is willing to take over the reins. I do not think that such a result is in conflict with anything said by the Court of Appeal in the McWhirter case¹. Nor, if the Attorney-General applies to be and is substituted for the plaintiffs, has the process of the court been abused. It would be otherwise if the d Attorney-General is not substituted. Then the action would be struck out, and the plaintiffs would have to bear the costs of all parties of their attempted intervention. This case should not, therefore, be read as an invitation to well-intentioned persons to intervene in matters which lie within the province of the Attorney-General.

In the foregoing circumstances I will hear further argument if the Attorney-General wishes to apply to be substituted for the plaintiffs.

e [The court then heard further argument on the Attorney-General's application.]

BRIGHTMAN J. There is now before me an application by the Attorney-General under RSC Ord 15, r 6, to be substituted for the original plaintiffs. I have already decided that the original plaintiffs have no locus standi. Counsel for the Attorney-General relies on Hughes v Pump House Hotel Co Ltd (No 2)², to which I referred in my judgment. The application is opposed by counsel for the local authorities. His submission falls, I think, into two parts. First, he says that he has had, in effect, a judgment in favour of his clients to the effect that the action is misconceived because the plaintiffs have no locus standi. It is now, says counsel for the local authorities, too late for the Attorney-General to make his application to be substituted. The local authorities have become entitled to have the action struck out.

g In effect, submits counsel for the local authorities, the application by the Attorney-General, if it were to be made at all, ought to have been made at an earlier stage in the proceedings.

I feel a certain natural reluctance to accept the submission of counsel for the local authorities for this reason, that if I now order that the action be struck out, it is inevitable—and counsel for the Attorney-General has already said so—that the h Attorney-General will apply ex parte for exactly the same relief as is sought on the plaintiffs' motion, and will adopt the evidence which has already been filed on the part of the existing plaintiffs; so that the only substantial effect of my striking out the action, as it seems to me, would be to increase the paperwork with no very obvious advantage to anybody. But, however that may be, looking at this application from the point of view of its timing, I do not see any real distinction between the case before i me and Hughes v Pump House Hotel Co Ltd (No 2)². In the Hughes case² Hughes thought he had a cause of action. He misinterpreted the effect of certain documents which, according to the decision of the Court of Appeal, left him with no cause of action at all, that is to say, no interest capable of being protected by the court. Subsequent to that decision of the Court of Appeal, the person who had the cause of action applied to be substituted, and such an order was made. So, also, in the case before me the plaintiffs thought they had a cause of action. After I decided that they had no cause of action the Attorney-General makes this application to be substituted for the plaintiffs, an application, as it seems to me, which he could never really have made before my decision that the plaintiffs had no cause of action. At any earlier stage the only order could, I think, have been that the Attorney-General should be added as an additional plaintiff. I do not see why I should hold that the Attorney-General's application in this case is made too late, if the application in the Hughes case¹ was made in time.

The second submission of counsel for the local authorities was this, that this is not a case of substituting the right party for the wrong party in the way that the right party was substituted in the Hughes case¹ for the wrong party. It is a case, submitted counsel for the local authorities, of substituting, as plaintiff, a party who sustains an entirely different character from that sustained by the existing plaintiffs. It is not a case where a mistake has been made as to where an interest or a cause of action is vested, but of replacing two incompetent plaintiffs by another person who sustains not the character sought to be sustained by the plaintiffs, but an entirely different character. I appreciate that there is that distinction between this case and the Hughes case¹. I do not, however, think that it is a fundamental distinction which ought to cause me to reach any different conclusion from that which was reached in the Hughes case¹.

Counsel for the local authorities also directed my attention to *Attorney-General and the Rhondda Urban District Council v Pontypridd Waterworks Co*², where the Attorney-General was brought in as an additional plaintiff ex relatione to an action which had originally been started by the relator in its own name. I shall not refer further to that case because I do not think it really assists me on the question whether it would or would not be right to accede to the Attorney-General's application. It appears to me that that case goes more to the question of costs than to the merits of the application which is now made by the Attorney-General.

I shall accordingly direct that the Attorney-General be substituted for the plaintiffs in this action.

During a strike of building workers the respondent, a trade union official, held a poster on the highway in front of a lorry and urged its driver not to make a delivery to a nearby site. His persuasion failed and the driver began to manoeuvre his lorry in order to drive on to the site. The respondent then deliberately stood in front of the lorry to prevent the driver proceeding. The driver asked him to move but did not attempt to drive him down. The police then arrived and the respondent, having again refused to move, was arrested and charged with wilful obstruction of the highway, contrary to s 121^a of the Highways Act 1959. No angry words or violent action occurred during the episode which lasted some nine minutes. At his trial the respondent contended that he had a defence to the charge by virtue of s 134^b of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 in that what he was doing was peaceful picketing. The justices dismissed the charge being of opinion that the nine minutes interspersed as it was with manoeuvring the lorry and the arrival of the police was not an unreasonably long time for the respondent to spend exercising his statutory right under s 134 of the 1971 Act to persuade the driver not to make the delivery. On appeal by the prosecutor,

Held – The proper approach to s 134 was not to ask whether what was done was reasonably necessary to organise peaceful persuasion but to ask whether what was done was reasonably necessary to procure attendance at or near the building site. Although it was perfectly proper for the respondent to be in attendance at the place where he was and to persuade the driver, if he could, not to enter the premises, those methods of persuasion were limited to the use of his voice and the exhibition of placards; s 134 did not authorise him to do acts, such as physically obstructing a vehicle or a person, which would be illegal apart from s 134. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the case remitted to the justices with a direction to convict (see p 1041 d and j to p 1042 b, post).

Case stated

Charles William Hunt, a police inspector, appealed by way of a case stated by the justices for the county borough of Stockport in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Stockport on 3rd October 1972 whereby they dismissed an information laid by the appellant against the respondent, John Edward Broome, alleging that on 5th September 1972 without lawful authority or excuse he wilfully obstructed the free passage along Short Street, a highway, contrary to s 121 of the Highways Act 1959. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the county borough of Stockport in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court on 3rd October 1972. On that date the justices dismissed an information laid by the appellant against the respondent alleging that on 5th September 1972 without lawful authority or excuse the respondent wilfully did obstruct the free passage along Short Street, a highway.

The facts found are these. On 5th September 1972 there was in progress a nationwide building workers' strike. On that date one Dickinson, a lorry driver, called at a building site and was accosted by the respondent, who was a trade union official. The respondent tried to dissuade Dickinson from entering the site, but it transpired that Dickinson was at the wrong site anyway so he turned his lorry round and set off for the correct site, which was obviously nearby. The respondent, knowing his Stockport no doubt, found a short cut and got to the second site at which Dickinson was aiming, before Dickinson. When Dickinson arrived at the second site the respondent held out a poster and asked Dickinson to draw into the side of the road, which he did. There was a brief conversation in which the respondent tried to dissuade Dickinson from driving his lorry into the second site as I have called it; his persuasion failed at the first attempt, and Dickinson began to manoeuvre his lorry with a view to driving it on to the site. The respondent then stood in front of the lorry with his poster, still shouting, in an attempt to dissuade Dickinson from delivering his load. Dickinson did not attempt to drive the respondent down, but asked him to move. Then the appellant, who is a police inspector, arrived; he spoke to Dickinson, and having spoken to Dickinson he turned to the respondent, told the respondent what the respondent must obviously have known anyway, that Dickinson wanted to enter the site. The respondent responded to the police inspector that he did not want Dickinson to enter the site, and the police inspector, the appellant, then said to the respondent if he did not move out of the way and let a Dickinson through, he would be arrested. The respondent did not move and he was immediately arrested—no angry words, no bad temper, but the assertion by the respondent of a no doubt genuinely believed right to stop Dickinson for the purpose of persuading him not to enter this site where some kind of trade dispute was in process.

b When the matter came before the justices and they had found those facts, there was cited to them s 134 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, which they are good enough to set out in full in the case, and which I must read. It is in these terms:

c '(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect where one or more persons (in this section referred to as "pickets"), in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute, attend at or near—(a) a place where a person works or carries on business, or (b) any other place where a person happens to be, not being a place where he resides, and do so only for the purpose of peacefully obtaining information from him or peacefully communicating information to him or peacefully persuading him to work or not to work.

d '(2) In the circumstances specified in the preceding subsection, the attendance of the pickets at that place for that purpose—(a) shall not of itself constitute an offence under section 7 of the Conspiracy, and Protection of Property Act 1875 (penalty for intimidation or annoyance by violence or otherwise) or under any other enactment or rule of law, and (b) shall not of itself constitute a tort.'

e 'We were of opinion that a period of nine minutes at most interspersed with manoeuvring of the lorry and intervention by the police was not an unreasonably long time for the respondent to spend in exercising his statutory right peacefully to seek to persuade a person not to work and that his statutory right is meaningless unless the picket places himself in such a position that the person to be persuaded is obliged to stop and listen for a reasonable length of time and accordingly we dismissed the case.'

f It is evident that the justices' approach was that s 134 gave the respondent what they described as a statutory right peacefully to seek to persuade a person not to work, and they go on to form the opinion that once that statutory right has been conferred, it must follow that the person who enjoys that right has at any rate a reasonable opportunity of exercising that right. They held that holding up Dickinson for a period not exceeding nine minutes was not an unreasonable action in performance or in exercise of the statutory right peacefully to persuade, which they regarded the respondent as having. The charge, as I have said, was laid under the Highways Act 1959, s 121, which provides:

g '(1) If a person, without lawful authority or excuse, in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage along a highway he shall be guilty of an offence . . .'

h That is the offence which the information charged in this case.

i Counsel for the respondent did say, as I understood his argument, that he was prepared to contend that the respondent's conduct would not have been an offence under s 121 quite apart from any special privileges which he enjoyed under the Industrial Relations Act 1971, but, be that as it may, for my part I should have thought it beyond argument that, leaving aside the special statutory provision affecting trade disputes, the conduct of the respondent in this case was an offence under s 121. It was a perfectly straightforward deliberate prevention of Dickinson from proceeding along the highway as he wished. Accordingly I should have thought there was no difficulty in this case at all if one for the moment leaves aside the special considerations arising out of a trade dispute.

Taking those considerations into account, the argument which has been put before us by counsel on behalf of the appellant is that the justices gave s 134 an unduly wide interpretation; he says that properly understood the section does not give a statutory right peacefully to persuade. Instead, according to his submission, it gives a statutory right to attend at the places specified in the section for the purposes specified in the section, and does not excuse acts otherwise unlawful which are not a necessary and essential consequence of attending at the place in question. Accordingly he says that since the attendance of the respondent was effective at the place without resorting to stopping Dickinson's lorry, he cannot claim that his stopping of Dickinson's lorry was lawful merely by virtue of the terms of the section. a

Counsel for the respondent on the other side argues for a wider interpretation; I think really the same interpretation that the justices appear to have applied to this provision themselves. He says that although perhaps as a matter of language the act which is rendered lawful by s 134 is the act of attending, yet you must have regard, so the argument goes, to the purpose for which attendance is taking place, and since the purpose of attendance is, amongst other things, peacefully to persuade Dickinson not to work, it follows that on the proper construction of the section the cloak of legality is thrown more widely than counsel for the appellant would have it, and extends to actions taken for the purposes mentioned in this section, for example the purpose of persuasion, provided that those actions, either in duration or character, are not unreasonable. I hope I have not done an injustice to counsel for the respondent's argument in putting it in that way. If that is right, it follows, he says, that the question for the justices was really one of fact and degree, and we could not say as a matter of law that the respondent had exceeded his powers by detaining Dickinson for the period and in the manner mentioned in the case. c

At first sight I confess that the interpretation urged on us by counsel for the appellant does seem to be a remarkably narrow one. If it is right, as he says, that the act which is rendered lawful is the act of attendance and nothing more, then it seemed to me at first that it was somewhat improbable that Parliament would have gone to all this trouble to render legal the act of attendance, an act which on its face is not likely to be an unlawful act at all. Accordingly at first impression I accepted the comment made by counsel for the respondent that the construction urged on behalf of the appellant seems to be a very narrow one. e

But further research into the section in my opinion makes it clear that counsel for the appellant is right. The first assistance I get in construing this section is to take at any rate a momentary look at s 7 of the Conspiracy, and Protection of Property Act 1875, because it will be remembered that one of the specific matters which are mentioned in s 134 is an offence under that now relatively old Act. This is what s 7 says: f

'Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority,—1. Uses violence [and I need not read that paragraph in full] or, 2. Persistently follows such other person about from place to place; or, 3. Hides any tools, clothes, or other property owned or used by such other person, or deprives him of or hinders him in the use thereof; or, 4. Watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place; or, 5. Follows such other person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road [commits an offence].' g

When one reads that section, it becomes apparent at once that under s 7 activity which could fairly be described as 'attending' is made a criminal offence, and one appreciates at once, I think, that s 134 and its predecessors had that kind of offence very much in mind. This at once makes it more easy, to my mind at any rate, to accept counsel for the appellant's argument about the scope of the section. Section 7 itself had a provision rather like s 134 included in it, because as originally enacted it went on in these terms: j a 'Attending at or near the house or place where a person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, in order merely to obtain or communicate information, shall not be deemed a watching or besetting within the meaning of this section.'

So that as far back as 1875 the idea of attending and watching and besetting as an offence was very much in the mind of Parliament.

b Those last words which I have read are repealed by s 2 of the Trade Disputes Act 1906, which substituted another provision, again very similar to the one we are considering, because s 2 (1) of the 1906 Act provided:

c 'It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting on their own behalf or on behalf of a trade union or of an individual employer or firm in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.'

d That provision has in turn been repealed and replaced by s 134, but the similarity of approach amongst the three provisions is clear, and this, as I have said, to my mind lends great force to the argument that when s 134 speaks of attending as the act which is rendered lawful, it probably means what it says, because 'attending' was initially one of the activities which might well be unlawful under the 1875 Act.

e The matter does not stop there, because there are other ways which spring to mind in which 'attending' might be unlawful unless specially provided for in this context, and the way which immediately springs to mind is if pickets remain on the highway for such a time and in such numbers that independently of any statutory protection, they might be committing an act of trespass against the owner of the soil. One need not go into the old cases to remind oneself of the fact that the owner of the soil has the right to sue in trespass those people who use the highway in excess of the public power so to use it. I have little doubt that if a number of pickets stood f all day outside particular premises, it might well be that they were committing a trespass apart from any statutory protection given to them, and I can see s 134 and its predecessors having very much in mind the fact that persons attending at the place specified might thus commit an act of trespass and require to be excused by statutory provisions.

g Both those matters seem to me to point to the fact that counsel for the appellant's approach is right. There is confirmation for it when one begins to look at such authority as there is on this and kindred sections. There is a useful Irish decision which counsel for the respondent brought to our attention, *L L Ferguson Ltd v O'Gorman*¹. This again was concerned with picketing, and it is a case on s 2 of the Trade Disputes Act 1906 which I have read. It contains, if I may say so with deference, a wealth of information of value about this and allied topics. I refer to it particularly h for a passage at the end of the judgment of Sullivan CJ. Having reviewed a number of judgments and gone into the subject in detail, he says²:

i 'Counsel on behalf of the appellants relied upon these cases as establishing that sect. 2 of the Trade Disputes Act does not justify a trespass. There is no doubt that in each of those cases it was held that the section did not justify the particular trespass that was committed, as appears from the passages that I have quoted. Madden J. said that the idea of trespass upon private property was wholly absent from that of picketing, and Dodd J. stated in the most general terms that the section did not justify a trespass. But I do not think that either of these learned Judges had present to his mind a trespass on the soil of a highway by the user of it in a manner that is not the reasonable and usual mode of using a highway as such, and accordingly I do not think that their judgments can be relied on as indicating their opinion that such a trespass could not be justified under the section in question. If it could not, then I find it difficult to give any reasonable interpretation to the section. When the Legislature declared it lawful for persons to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides, or works, or carries on business, it cannot reasonably have contemplated that such a house or place would be situated in a waste or no man's land. The usual approach to a residence or place of business is by a public highway and unless the right to attend at or near a residence or place of business is a right to attend on a public highway I do not see how such a right can be exercised at all, consistently with the decisions in *Larkin's Case*¹, and *McCusker's Case*² that private property may not be invaded. I am, therefore, driven to the conclusion that sect. 2 of the Trade Disputes Act authorises the user of a highway by the persons and for the purposes described in that section, and that it therefore justifies a user of the highway which would constitute a trespass at common law. Whether the user proved in any particular case is such a user as can be justified under the section will depend on the particular circumstances . . .

I find that case interesting and valuable for many reasons. First of all it confirms earlier authority that a trespass on private property is not authorised by the 1906 Act, nor, I would have thought, by the 1971 Act. Yet if counsel for the respondent's argument is to be taken any distance, it must surely in due course reach the point when he has to contend that the right of peaceful persuasion cannot be exercised without trespassing on private property, and it will then be necessary for him, or whoever argues the case, to argue that such a trespass is authorised by the section. The tone of the Irish cases is entirely to the contrary; it is accepted there that a private trespass is not authorised, and it is pointed out that the significance of s 134 may well in the main be the fact that it authorises the use of a highway in a manner which would otherwise amount to a trespass against the owner of the soil.

Coming a little nearer to the present time, and a little nearer home, there is an authority of this court in *Tynan v Balmer*³. This was a case where there was a strike at the English Electric factory on the East Lancashire Road, and the strikers were, as we would now call it, demonstrating in front of the factory. It was a well managed strike, entirely lacking in disturbance and bad temper, and friendly relations were maintained with the police. The particular device which was used in this case was that some 40 pickets formed themselves into a circle and proceeded to walk round in that circle at the entrance gate to the factory, thereby effectively preventing vehicles from leaving through the entrance gate. It seems that they walked in this way because they had been advised that they might commit obstruction if they stood still, but the obstruction was equally effective by the moving circle as it would be by a number of men standing still. They were asked by a police constable to desist and they declined, and the leader of them was charged and convicted below of the offence of obstructing a constable in the execution of his duty.

This case was the subject of a reasoned judgment by the recorder of Liverpool, and it is fair to say, as counsel for the respondent has said, that his conclusion in the end depends on the fact that the activities of the pickets were not the communication of information or the receipt of information or an act of persuasion, in other words that what they were doing was not fulfilling one of the statutory purposes, but it is perfectly clear from the judgment of Lord Parker CJ, and also from my personal recollection of the case because I was a member of the court, that the case was argued very much on the same basis as counsel for the respondent has a argued the present case before us, namely that there was a right to persuade, and that that right must be protected by necessary and reasonable means. Lord Parker CJ in agreeing with the other judgments, referred to the argument of counsel thus¹:

b '... despite the finding here that one of the objects was to ensure that vehicles were brought to a stop, even so, that was permitted, if I may use that term, by s. 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, because the rights conferred by c that section involved, as he would say, the stopping of a vehicle for the purpose, for instance, of communicating information. Counsel conceded that no right was conferred of stopping a pedestrian, apparently on the basis that you could communicate your information by walking alongside him, but he suggested that when you get to a vehicle the section authorised and permitted the stopping of vehicles. I am quite unable to accept that argument, and on the findings of d the recorder in this case I am quite clear that an offence was committed.'

There is no doubt at all that the court on that occasion, even if obiter, was rejecting the suggestion that one approaches this section by asking oneself what need reasonably to be done in order that that peaceful persuasion may be organised. One approaches the section by instructing oneself that that which is rendered legal is attendance, e and asking whether what has been done is nothing more than was necessary to procure attendance; if something was done which was more than was necessary to secure attendance, and if also what was done was in breach of the law, there is nothing f in s 134 to protect you.

I find the matter conveniently and usefully summarised in Citrine's Trade Union Law², where the learned editor says this:

g 'Similarly, if the manner of the picketing ceases to be peaceful or becomes an obstruction or a nuisance, or endangers the public peace, the picketing will cease to be lawful. Thus, if a picket commits a private nuisance, as by violently and continually banging on the door, shouting, obstructing ingress or egress, or otherwise seriously interfering with the enjoyment of the house, or if he
h commits a public nuisance such as behaving in a manner calculated to cause a breach of the peace, or unreasonably obstructing the highway, his common law right to picket and his right to "attend" under the section will cease and neither will protect him from civil or criminal liability for any of these acts, or for any "watching or besetting" "with a view to compel", which he may also have committed. So also if the picketing is carried out in such numbers or otherwise in such a manner as to be likely to intimidate those subject to it, or to obstruct or molest them against their will, it will be unlawful. Any show i or threat of violence, or any other unlawful threat likely to create fear in the mind of a reasonable man, will render picketing unlawful, and may make it criminal. Pickets are therefore not entitled, in order to compel people to listen to them, to obstruct them by deliberately standing in their way or catching hold of their arms. Nor are they entitled to obstruct the passage of vehicles by lying j down in the highway in front of them, or otherwise blocking the highway. Neither may they continue to pester, i.e., "molest", those persons who do not wish to listen and who have requested them to desist. It will thus be seen that the right to picket is a very intangible one which is closely limited by the equal right of others to go about their lawful affairs free from obstruction, molestation or intimidation.'

My conclusion in this case is, as is not disputed, that it was perfectly proper for the respondent to be in attendance at the place where he was and that he was entitled there to persuade Dickinson, if he could, not to enter the premises. The methods of persuasion are limited to what counsel for the appellant calls oral or visual methods, that is to say the use of the voice and the exhibition of placards, and the section does not authorise pickets to do acts such as the physical obstruction of a vehicle or a person which would be illegal apart from s 134. a

For those reasons I think the justices applied the wrong principle and reached the wrong conclusion. I would allow the appeal and send the case back with a direction to convict. b

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

BRIDGE J. I agree.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the justices with a direction to convict.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was granted, the court having certified that the following was a point of law of general public importance: whether, if a person attends on the highway for the purposes set out in s 134 (1) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 and deliberately stops a vehicle for the purpose of peacefully persuading the driver not to work he has a defence to a charge under s 121 of the Highways Act 1959 by reason of s 134 (2) (b) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. c

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, BUCKLEY AND STEPHENSON IJJ

11th, 12th APRIL 1973 f

Husband and wife – Property – Matrimonial home – Both parties contributing to purchase – Contributions by wife – Contributions in looking after home and caring for family – Contributions to cost of improving home – Imputed trust – House purchased by husband before marriage contemplated – Husband sole owner at all times – Wife's contributions in looking after home etc not sufficient to entitle her to beneficial interest in home – Contributions to cost of improving home entitling her to share – Married Women's Property Act 1882, s 17 – Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, s 37. g

In 1955 the husband bought a house. He did not at that time contemplate marriage to his future wife. The husband and the wife were married in December 1957 and they lived in the house which the husband had bought. In 1966 the wife left the matrimonial home taking the two children of the marriage with her. The husband remained in the home, continuing to pay the mortgage instalments as he had done ever since he had bought it. By March 1970 he had paid off the mortgage completely. The parties were subsequently divorced. The wife claimed a property right in the home under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882; alternatively she claimed a transfer of the property, or a share in it, under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. The registrar dismissed the claim under s 4 of the 1970 Act and the wife did not appeal. In relation to the claim under the 1882 Act the registrar found that both parties had 'utilised their resources for their joint living and benefit . . . both in respect of the home and upkeep, the occasional mortgage payments, some of the electricity bills, tiles and fittings, some of the articles h a and the food came from [the wife's] earnings'. On the basis of those findings the registrar held that the wife was entitled to a one-quarter share in the property. The husband appealed.

Held – In an application under s 17 of the 1882 Act the court could only hold that the wife was, in consequence of her contributions, entitled to a share in the matrimonial home, where a trust could be imputed for her benefit on the ground that the house had been acquired by the parties through their joint efforts, the wife contributing, directly or indirectly, to the discharge of the purchase price or on the ground that the wife had contributed to the cost of improving the home within s 37 of the 1970 Act. Since the house had been acquired by the husband well before the marriage and had remained his sole property throughout, the wife could only be held to be entitled to a share if her subsequent contributions were directly referable to the making of improvements to the house or (per Lord Denning MR) to the payment of the mortgage instalments; contributions in looking after the home and caring for the family were irrelevant. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the case remitted to the registrar to enquire whether the wife was entitled to a share by virtue of s 37 of the 1970 Act on the ground that she had made contributions to the cost of improving the home, with liberty to either party to make a further application under s 4 of the 1970 Act (see p 1045 b to g and p 1046 a d e g and h, post).

d Per Lord Denning MR. After there has been a divorce the property rights of the parties should be adjusted by means of an application under s 4 of the 1970 Act; it is unnecessary to decide the exact property rights under s 17 of the 1882 Act when all appropriate orders can be made under the 1970 Act (see p 1045 h, post).

i Appeal

This was an appeal by the husband, Cyril Kowalczuk, against so much of the order of Mr Registrar Elliott, made on 17th October 1972 on the hearing of applications by the wife, Maria Kowalczuk, under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 and s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, as declared on the application under s 17 of the 1882 Act that the wife was beneficially entitled to a one-quarter share of or interest in the equity of the property which had been the matrimonial home. The registrar dismissed the wife's application under s 4 of the 1970 Act. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

M E Mann for the husband.

Dennis Naish for the wife.

LORD DENNING MR. Husband and wife were married in December 1957. They had three children. One child died in infancy; there are two now living, a boy born in 1962, a girl born in 1963. After nine years of marriage, the wife left the house in September 1966. She took the two children with her. There was afterwards a divorce on the ground of two years' separation. A decree nisi was made on 12th October 1971, and a decree absolute on 17th February 1972. The husband has been paying maintenance of the children. The wife has remarried.

The question today is about the house, which was the matrimonial home. The feature which distinguishes this case from others is that it belonged to the husband long before the marriage. He bought it on 14th September 1955; that is over two years before the marriage. As far as we know, the parties had never met one another at that time. At any rate, they had not contemplated marriage. The husband bought it in his own name for the sum of £2,450. He paid £800 down and raised £1,650 on mortgage. Ever since that time he has been paying off the mortgage instalments of £12 17s 2d a month. He paid them before the marriage, during the marriage and after his wife left. By March 1970 he had paid off the mortgage completely. So there it is, a house bought two years before the marriage. The husband has now paid off all the mortgage instalments. So in point of law it is certainly his property.

The wife in 1972, although she had left six years before, put in a claim to this house. She put it in on two footings. One footing was that she had a property right in it under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882. Alternatively, she put in a claim to a transfer of the property or a share in it under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970.

I would first say a word about the application under the 1970 Act. That Act gives a wide power to the court to adjust the property rights of the parties if it is just so to do. The registrar dismissed the wife's application under the 1970 Act and the wife does not appeal from that decision. That is very significant. If the wife had a good claim in equity to a share in the property, I should have thought she would have invoked the jurisdiction under s 4 of the 1970 Act. But she has not done so before us. Perhaps she or her advisers have no great confidence in the equity of her claim. At any rate, she has confined her claim before us so as to limit it to a property right under s 17 of the 1882 Act.

The registrar had before him the evidence of the parties. He was much impressed with the wife. He said:

'She has certainly lived frugally; she makes her own clothes. She is in no way extravagant... She utilised her wages towards the upkeep of the home and latterly she worked extremely long hours in a restaurant... she saved and bought a car which she took with her... She says that she paid some of the mortgage instalments... There is no doubt that both utilised their resources for their joint living and benefit... I feel myself that both in respect of the home and upkeep, the occasional mortgage payments, some of the electricity bills, tiles and fittings, some of the articles and the food came from her, the Applicant's, earnings.'

On those findings, the registrar held that the wife was entitled to a share in the property. His mind had fluctuated, he said, between a quarter and a fifth, but eventually he came down in favour of a quarter of the equity. All the a reasoning of the registrar would have been very pertinent if he had been making an order under s 4 of the 1970 Act, especially having regard to s 5 (1) (f), which directs the court to have regard to the contributions made by each. But I do not think they are so pertinent to a claim under s 17 of the 1882 Act. Our attention has been directed to the cases under s 17 in the House of Lords: *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹ and *Gissing v Gissing*²; and to the subsequent cases in this court, such as *Hargrave v Newton*³, *Davis v Vale*⁴ and *Heseltine v Heseltine*⁵. Since those cases there has been the judgment of Bagnall J in *Cowcher v Cowcher*⁶ and the judgment of this court in *Hazell v Hazell*⁷. Bagnall J had not the opportunity of seeing the report of *Hazell v Hazell*⁷. If he had done so, he might have expressed himself differently. That case, with the others, shows that in this court we consistently hold that where a matrimonial home is acquired by both parties by their joint efforts from the very beginning, and the wife makes contributions, direct or indirect, to the purchase price or the mortgage instalments, then in those circumstances the law will impute or impose a trust for her benefit, the amount of her share depending on the circumstances.

b But those cases do not apply to the present case where the house was bought a long time before the marriage by the husband and was undoubtedly his sole property from the very beginning, the wife having made no contributions to its acquisition. In those circumstances the wife gets no share in the house by reason of subsequent contributions unless they are directly referable to the making of improvements to the house or to the payments of the mortgage instalments. The making of improvements is expressly covered by s 37 of the 1970 Act. That is a declaratory provision declaring what the law is and was before the Act. It shows that if the wife had contributed money or money's worth to the improvement of the property, the contribution, if of a substantial nature, would give her a share in the property to such an extent as may seem, in all the circumstances, to be just. In the present case there is a good deal of evidence that the wife did contribute, both in money and by her own physical help, to the repair, alteration and improvement to the house and garage. Such contributions come within the scope of that s 37 and there would be a trust for her in that regard.

e But I would not be prepared to go so far as the registrar seems to have done in taking into account—under s 17—her contributions in looking after and bringing up the family and in looking after the house, buying the food and so forth. Such contributions can be considered under the 1970 Act (see s 5 (1) (f)) but not under s 17 of the 1882 Act. So in this case I would be in favour of allowing the appeal to this extent; instead of giving to the wife a quarter share of the equity in the house, I would remit the case to the registrar so that he can decide what share it is just to award to the wife, having regard to any contributions by her, in money or money's worth, to the improvement of the property.

g I would only add this: I hope that, in future, after there has been a divorce, the property rights of the parties may be adjusted by means of an application under s 4 of the 1970 Act. It is unnecessary to decide the exact property rights under s 17 of the 1882 Act when all appropriate orders can be made under the 1970 Act. For instance, in this case, even if the wife's contributions do now entitle her—as a matter of property rights to a share—the registrar might well order that, instead of the house being sold, her share may be extinguished and the husband should pay her a lump sum in place of it; or he might not order him to pay any sum. The principles to be applied would be those which are stated in *Wachtel v Wachtel*⁸.

So I would prefer, therefore, for the matter to be dealt with on both sides under s 4; but the appeal does not come before us on that basis. It comes before us only under s 17. On that basis I think there is ground for enquiry whether there is a trust to be imposed by s 37; but otherwise it seems to me, this house having been bought long before the marriage, no trust is to be imposed on him by virtue of her contribution in looking after the home and caring for the family. I would allow the appeal to that extent.

BUCKLEY LJ. I agree. We are not concerned here with any question arising under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, for neither party has attempted to make any claim under that section. We are only concerned with an application under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882, which is a purely procedural section under which parties can apply to the court for a declaration as to what their legal and equitable interests are without any opportunity for adjustment by the court. One thing I think is quite clear in this case, and that is that at the time the parties married this house belonged exclusively to the husband. He had bought it two years earlier. He had made a substantial cash payment from his own resources towards the purchase price and had raised the balance, which was about two-thirds of the purchase price, on a mortgage on which he alone was liable for payments of the instalments. The house was his. If, therefore, the wife is entitled to any equitable interest in any share in the house, it must be as the result of some trust declared expressly or by implication by the husband since the marriage. In consequence of the provisions of s 53 of the Law of Property Act 1925, such a declaration of trust would have to be in writing unless it were a case of a resulting or constructive trust. This is not a case in which the two parties to the marriage together embarked on the purchase of a house with a common intention that they should contribute towards discharging the purchase price. It may be that the wife after the marriage made contributions to the family expenses—may even have paid, as the registrar found that she did, I think, some of the mortgage instalments, and in that way have assisted her husband in discharging his liabilities under the mortgage; but that alone in my judgment would be insufficient to raise any constructive trust, although it might possibly give the wife a right to relief against her husband on some other ground such as, for instance, that she had paid money for his use, or something of that kind; but would not give her any equitable interest in the property. It seems, however, to be clear that if she did make contributions toward the cost of improving the property, she would be entitled under s 37 of the 1970 Act to some interest in the house under the statutory provisions contained in that section. The registrar, naturally enough, has not attempted to quantify what that interest would be, and the matter, it seems to me, must go back to him for the purpose of considering that aspect of the case. I agree that this appeal succeeds and should be allowed, that the matter should be remitted to the registrar to quantify such interest, if any, as the wife may establish that she is entitled to under s 37; and at that stage I suppose it would still be open to either party to make further applications to the court under s 4.

STEPHENSON LJ. I agree with both the judgments which have been delivered and have nothing of my own to add.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to registrar to determine what interest, if any, the wife was entitled to in the light of her contributions to the improvements, with liberty to either party to make further application under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

EDMUND DAVIES, MEGAW LJ AND SIR SEYMOUR KARMINSKI

10th, 11th, 12th, 13th APRIL 1973

Negligence – Duty to take care – Arbitrator – Person acting in arbitral capacity – Exercise of professional skill and judgment – Architect – Interim certificate – Building contract – Architect appointed to supervise works under building contract between employer and contractor – Contract in RIBA form – Interim certificate issued by architect over-certifying amount due to contractor – Whether architect liable to employer for negligent over-certification.

By an oral contract the plaintiff engaged the defendants, a firm of architects, in connection with the designing and building of a house. It was an implied term of the contract that the defendants would perform their instructions in a competent and efficient manner. Thereafter the plaintiff entered into a contract with builders for the building of the house in accordance with the defendants' drawings and bills of quantities. The contract was in the standard RIBA form. The defendants were appointed architects for the purpose. The work went badly and the plaintiff brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for negligent supervision and negligence in issuing two interim certificates. The official referee found in the defendants' favour on the issue of negligent supervision but found that there had been over-certifying to the extent of £3,090; he held that, in issuing the certificates, the defendants were in breach of a duty of care owed to the plaintiff and awarded damages accordingly. The defendants appealed.

Held – It was established by authority that, in issuing a final certificate, an architect was exercising his professional skill and judgment in the role of an arbitrator and was not therefore liable for negligence in the exercise of his functions in that capacity. No relevant distinction could be drawn between the function of an architect in issuing a final certificate and his function in issuing interim certificates which called for professional skill in calculating the amount for which the certificate should be made. It followed, therefore, that the defendants could not be liable in negligence in respect of the interim certificates and the appeal would be allowed (see p 1052 c, p 1053 f and g, p 1054 g, p 1055 f, p 1056 f to h, p 1057 d and f, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the defendants, Ronald Thackrah, Arthur Simpson and T Richard Collick (carrying on business as 'Chippindale and Edmondson') against the judgment of his Honour Judge William Stabb QC, official referee, given on 11th January 1972 whereby on the trial of the action he gave judgment for the plaintiff, Joseph Dermot Sutcliffe, against the first and second defendants for £588 with costs to be taxed if not agreed, and for the third defendant against the plaintiff and dismissed the defendants' counterclaim. The grounds of appeal were (i) that the official referee was wrong in law in holding that an architect employed under the standard RIBA contract and under a duty to issue interim certificates from time to time was liable to the employer for negligent over-certification of the sums due from the employer to the builder; (ii) that the official referee was wrong in law and/or exercised his discretion improperly in holding that the defendants should pay the whole of the plaintiff's costs. The plaintiff cross-appealed seeking an order that the judgment be varied by increasing the award to £3,629 and interest thereon with costs to be taxed if not agreed. The acts are set out in the judgment of Edmund Davies LJ. d

M R Hickman for the plaintiff. f

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. The question posed by this appeal may be thus stated: is an architect liable in damages for breach of his contract with a building employer if he negligently, but honestly, issues interim certificates in relation to work done under an RIBA contract, as a result of which he overcertifies the sums due to the building contractor. It arises by way of a defendants' appeal from the judgment of his Honour Judge William Stabb QC of 11th January 1972, awarding the plaintiff £588, with costs, against the first and second defendants. The plaintiff cross-appeals for an order that the damages be increased but we are relieved from the necessity of dealing with that matter as the parties have agreed that, in the event of his retaining his judgment on the issue of liability, the plaintiff's damages should be increased to £2,000. g

The defendants are a firm of architects practising under the style of 'Chippindale and Edmondson'. In 1962 the plaintiff engaged them in connection with the designing and building of a dwelling-house on a site in Pontefract owned by him. No documentary evidence is available regarding the terms of the defendants' engagement. By their re-amended defence they admitted only that there was an implied term in the oral contract of employment that they would perform their instructions 'in a competent and efficient manner', but they denied being under any duty to the plaintiff to use reasonable care in issuing certificates in respect of work done by any contractor during the course of construction of the house. h a Thereafter, on 1st October 1963, the plaintiff entered into a contract with David A Walbank (Builders) Ltd to build the house for the sum of £22,368 in accordance with the drawings and bills of quantities prepared by the defendants (who were appointed for the purpose both architects and quantity surveyors). The contract was in the RIBA standard form of contract (1963 edition), and the contractor undertook to complete the works on and subject to the conditions annexed thereto. The builders had already begun work on the site before their contract was signed, and the date of completion was fixed as 31st January 1964. But the work went badly and by the end of June 1964 the plaintiff turned the builders off the site—justifiably, as the official referee held. Other builders then completed the works, but for a larger sum than originally contracted for. The plaintiff sued the original builders, but they went into liquidation.

b In March 1968 the plaintiff issued a writ—

‘for damages for negligence and breach of duty by the Defendants as Architects employed by the Plaintiff in supervising the building of a dwellinghouse ... and in certifying for work not done or improperly done by the Builder.’

d For present purposes, it is sufficient to say that in the ensuing prolonged trial during 1971 and 1972 the plaintiff complained of (1) negligent supervision throughout, and (2) negligence by the defendants in issuing the last two interim certificates. The official referee found in the defendants’ favour in relation to the complaint of lack of proper supervision. The second complaint related to certificate 9 for £2,620 issued by the defendants on 25th May 1964 and certificate 10 for £1,837 issued on 1st July 1964. As to these, the official referee found that there had been over-certifying to the extent of £3,090. While disputing the correctness of that figure, counsel for the defendants, accepts that, assuming that a duty of care was owed by the defendants, they must pay the plaintiff £2,000 in respect of the consequential damage sustained by him. But by this appeal they challenge the official referee’s finding that any such duty exists.

e Before turning to the legal authorities, I must say something about the conditions annexed to the building contract. While the defendants were not, of course, parties thereto, some of these contemplated their acting solely as the agents of the employers, others as involving them in a wider role. Examples of the former are condition 2 (‘Architect’s Instructions’), 5 (‘Levels and setting out of the Works’), and 17 (‘Assignment or sub-letting’). Counsel for the defendants points to others as involving the architects playing a role independent both of employer and contractor and holding the scales evenly between them. These include condition 11 (5) relating to the issuing of interim certificates, 15 (1) as to a certificate of practical completion, 22 (‘Damages for non-completion’), 23 (‘Extension of time’) and 30 (‘Certificates and payments’).

f Condition 30 (1) and (2) related to interim certificates, which were required to be issued at monthly intervals, and was in these terms:

h ‘(1) At the Period of Interim Certificates named in the appendix to these Conditions the Architect shall issue a certificate stating the amount due to the Contractor from the Employer, and the Contractor shall, on presenting any such certificate to the Employer, be entitled to payment therefor within the Period for Honouring Certificates named in the appendix to these Conditions. Interim valuations shall be made whenever the Architect considers them to be necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be stated as due in an Interim Certificate.

i ‘(2) The amount stated as due in an Interim Certificate shall, subject to any agreement between the parties as to stage payments, be the total value of the work properly executed and of the materials and goods delivered to or adjacent to the Works for use thereon up to and including a date not more than seven days before the date of the said certificate less any amount which may be retained by the Employer (as provided in sub-clause (3) of this Condition) and less any instalments previously paid under this Condition . . .'

Condition 30 (6) and (7) dealt with the final certificate in this way:

'(6) So soon as is practicable but before the expiration of 3 months from the end of the Defects Liability Period stated in the appendix to these Conditions or from completion of making good defects under clause 15 of these Conditions or from receipt by the Architect of the documents referred to in paragraph (b) of sub-clause (5) of this Condition, whichever is the latest, the Architect shall issue the Final Certificate. The Final Certificate shall state:—(a) The sum of the amount paid to the Contractor under Interim Certificates and the amount named in the said appendix as Limit of Retention Fund, and (b) The Contract sum adjusted as necessary in accordance with the terms of these conditions, and the difference (if any) between the two sums shall be expressed in the said certificate as a balance due to the Contractor from the Employer or to the Employer from the Contractor as the case may be. Subject to any deduction authorised by these Conditions, the said balance as from the fourteenth day after presentation of the Final Certificate by the Contractor to the Employer shall be a debt payable by the Employer to the Contractor or as the case may be as from the fourteenth day after issue of the Final Certificate shall be a debt payable by the Contractor to the Employer.'

'(7) Unless a written request to concur in the appointment of an arbitrator shall have been given under clause 35 of these Conditions by either party before the Final Certificate has been issued or by the Contractor within 14 days after such issue, the said certificate shall be conclusive evidence in any proceedings arising out of this Contract (whether by arbitration under clause 35 of these Conditions or otherwise) that the Works have been properly carried out and completed in accordance with the terms of this Contract and that any necessary effect has been given to all the terms of this Contract which require an adjustment to be made to the Contract Sum, except and in so far as any sum mentioned in the said certificate is erroneous by reason of:—(a) Fraud, dishonesty or fraudulent concealment relating to the Works, or any part thereof, or to any matter dealt with in the said certificate; or (b) Any defect (including any omission) in the Works, or any part thereof which reasonable inspection or examination at any reasonable time during the carrying out of the Works or before the issue of the said certificate would not have disclosed; or (c) Any accidental inclusion or exclusion of any work, materials, goods or figure in any computation or any arithmetical error in any computation.'

Condition 30 (8) provided:

'Save as aforesaid no certificate of the Architect shall of itself be conclusive evidence that any works materials or goods to which it relates are in accordance with this Contract.'

I should finally refer to condition 35 ('Arbitration'), para (1) of which is in these terms:

'Provided always that in case any dispute or difference shall arise between the Employer or the Architect on his behalf and the Contractor, either during the progress or after the completion or abandonment of the Works, as to the construction of this Contract or as to any matter or thing of whatsoever nature arising thereunder or in connection therewith (including any matter or thing left by this Contract to the discretion of the Architect or the withholding by the Architect of any certificate to which the Contractor may claim to be entitled a or the measurement and valuation mentioned in clause 30 (5) (a) of these Conditions or the rights and liabilities of the parties under clauses 25, 26, 32 or 33 of these Conditions), then such dispute or difference shall be and is hereby referred to the arbitration and final decision of a person to be agreed between the parties ...'

b It follows from the foregoing that, on presenting an interim certificate to the employer, the contractor was entitled to be paid the amount certified within 14 days unless meanwhile the employer invoked the arbitration clause. But a final certificate was binding on the employer immediately it was issued, whereas the contractor was given 14 days within which he could take steps to challenge it by setting in motion the arbitration machinery provided by condition 35.

c I revert to the question posed by this appeal. There being no suggestion of dishonesty by the defendants or latent or accidental inclusions or exclusions within the exception to condition 30 (7), counsel for the plaintiff conceded that, were we here dealing with a final certificate issued by the defendants, their negligence in over-certifying would create no liability in them to the plaintiff. He finds himself obliged to make that concession as far as this court is concerned, for there is authority for so saying, and while he wants to keep the point open, he accepts that it is binding on this court.

d In *Stevenson v Watson*¹, where, it should be noted, the building contract contained no arbitration clause, an action against an architect for negligently under-certifying failed. The contract provided that the parties²—

e 'will be bound to leave all questions or matters of dispute which may arise during the progress of the works or in the settlement of the account to the architect whose decisions shall be final and binding upon all parties.'

Denman J said³:

f '... it seems to me that the architect is an arbitrator from the beginning to the end of the contract, he is throughout to have his eye on the work, and give certificates from time to time, all having reference to his final certificate, and, unless he gave the duty up altogether from the first appointment, he is from the first a person exercising judgment on a matter in which the parties cannot exercise judgment. I think, therefore, that the parties have trusted to him, and that from the beginning he must exercise his functions fairly and honestly between them, and that if he violates that duty he is liable to an action. If he honestly performs them then he honestly performs his bargain, if it be a bargain, or his duty, if it be a duty, arising from the acceptance of the functions, and the parties must abide by it.'

g Binding on us is the decision of this court in *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁴, where the building contract contained a clause providing:

h 'A certificate of the architect, ... shewing the final balance due or payable to the contractors, is to be conclusive evidence ... that the contractors are entitled to receive payment of the final balance ...'

i Defending the architect's action to recover his fees, the employer asserted that the plaintiff had negligently issued a final certificate for a larger amount than he ought to have done. A L Smith MR and Collins LJ, following, inter alia, *Stevenson v Watson*¹, held that the architect in certifying occupied the position of an arbitrator

3 (1879) 4 CPD at 162

4 [1901] 1 KB 624 at 629, [1900-3] All ER Rep 969 at 971

and was therefore not liable for negligence in the exercise of his functions in that capacity. But the powerful dissenting judgment of Romer LJ has attracted the support of many who share the view he expressed¹, that to hold that the employer is in such circumstances without a remedy 'would be a most lamentable conclusion'. Outstanding support to that dissent was expressed in South Africa by Ogilvie Thompson J in *Hoffman v Meyer*². And Lord Denning MR, who had expressed doubt in *Hosier & Dickinson Ltd v P & M Kaye Ltd*³ regarding the correctness of *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁴, recently cited the South African judgment with evident approval in his dissenting judgment in *Arenson v Arenson*⁵.

But *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁴ binds us. It dealt, however, with a final certificate, whereas we are here concerned with two negligently issued interim certificates. Does it follow that *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁴ protects these defendants? Not necessarily, according to Lord Radcliffe in *R B Burden v Swansea Corp*⁶. And in *Wisbech Rural District Council v Ward*⁷ Sankey J said:

'Although it is probably right to say that in giving a final certificate the architect acts in a quasi-judicial character unless there is some express clause in the contract to contradict it, it cannot, I think, be asserted that in giving an interim certificate he is so acting. Personally I should have thought that the inference was just the other way—namely, that in giving an interim certificate he is merely acting as agent for the building owner unless there is something in the contract to contradict that; but after all the contract must be looked at to see whether or no in giving an interim certificate the architect was acting as an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator.'

The matter went to appeal and the finding of the learned trial judge as to negligence was reversed. Atkin LJ⁸ said with reference to *Chambers v Goldthorpe*⁴:

'I am not aware of any case which has extended that doctrine to the granting of interim certificates, and I do not desire to express any opinion about it, except to say that it is obvious that that case would have to be very carefully considered before we came to a conclusion in favour of the plaintiffs, supposing that negligence were otherwise proved. In this case it appears to me quite definitely to be disproved.'

After reviewing the authorities, the official referee in the present case said:

'Plainly it is part of an architect's duty of supervision, as agent for his employer, to see that the work is properly executed, and therefore to my mind supervision and the issuing of interim certificates cannot be regarded as wholly separate and distinct functions. I think that it was rightly contended on behalf of the plaintiff that in a well supervised contract an architect would not certify for work not properly executed. I have come to the conclusion that the architect, in discharging his function of issuing interim certificate, is primarily acting in the protection of his employer's interests, by determining what payment he can properly make on account, such determination being based on his assessment of the value of the work properly carried out, that assessment being performed by virtue of his professional skill, for which the building owner a has engaged him. It is in my view part of his supervisory function to see that the value of work properly executed, and only work properly executed, is included in the valuation for the purpose of an interim certificate, and that therefore he is under a duty of care to his employer in the performance of that function. Accordingly, if by his failure to exercise due skill and care, he should fail to exclude from the certificate the value of work not properly executed, he would

b in my view be liable to his employer for any damage attributable to such default.'

But if *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ is not to govern this appeal, some basis must be established for saying that the architect performs a different role when finally certifying from that played when he issues interim certificates. Counsel for the plaintiff has stressed that, in the words of Lord Blackburn in *Tharsis Sulphur & Copper Co v M'Elroy & Sons*², the latter—

'were made out with a view to regulating the advances, and shewing how much should be paid on account, not at all as shewing how much was to be paid ultimately upon the final account and reckoning.'

d That view was recently repeated by Lord Denning MR who in *Dawnays Ltd v F G Minter Ltd*³ described an interim certificate as being the equivalent of cash or being like a bill of exchange. But, to my way of thinking, there nevertheless remains the difficulty of following why this undoubted difference between the effect of the two types of certificate should affect the nature of the functions performed by the architects in the two cases. 'Condition 30 (2) requires that—e 'The amount stated in an Interim Certificate shall . . . be the total value of the work properly executed and of the materials and goods delivered . . .'

It is true that, as a rule, the payments contemplated thereby represent only the approximate value of the work done and materials delivered, but even so some exercise of judgment based on and calling for professional skill is contemplated.

f Adopting the distinction drawn by Lord Coleridge CJ in *Stevenson v Watson*⁴ between a professional duty and a clerkly duty, the former is generally involved in calculating the amount for which an interim certificate should be made out, even though I suppose there might be certificates relating solely to the value of materials delivered to the site where the work involved could be of a purely 'clerkly' nature, negligence in relation to which would presumably impose liability on the architect despite his
g professional status. Such is not the case, however, in relation to either of the interim certificates with which we are presently concerned, and I do not find myself able to exclude them from the ambit of the ratio decidendi of *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹.

This is a conclusion to which I have reluctantly come. The immunity of a person filling an arbitral role from being held liable in negligence is said to be based on public policy. I can understand such immunity being extended to the judge who is
h a stranger to both parties and is under no greater duty to the one than to the other. But the position of architects under a building contract is undoubtedly different, as was brought out in the Canadian case of *Badgley v Dickson*⁵, cited in *Hudson*⁶. There it was held that, although an architect employed by the building owner may, as between the owner and the contractor by the terms of their building contract, be in the position of an arbitrator and his decision between them be unimpeachable if honest, yet as between himself and the owner he is answerable for either negligence or unskilfulness in the performance of his duty as architect. Osler JA said¹:

'In the case before us the action and counterclaim are based upon a distinct contract, by which the plaintiff was employed as a skilled professional person to perform certain services for reward, and he is not, in my opinion, absolved from the usual obligations attaching to such a contract merely because under another contract between his employer and the builder he may, as arbitrator, have determined between them as to the performance of that contract in a manner which assumes that he has properly performed his own.'

Such an attitude commends itself to my mind, and I have difficulty in seeing that public policy, that 'unruly horse', requires its rejection.

What is the public policy which necessitates another conclusion in the case of an architect under a building contract? Whatever may be urged as to the necessity for judges, arbitrators and quasi-arbitrators in general being held immune, such an architect is in a special position which calls for separate consideration. The contractor is fully aware of his engagement by the employer, and there is therefore no concealment of the fact that for many purposes he is the agent of the latter. And I fail to see why a duty to the employer, in relation to other aspects of his position, to exercise proper care in making a professional judgment should be regarded as inconsistent with his holding the scales evenly between the parties or as putting at risk his capacity to do so. It is true that knowledge that he owed a duty of care to his employer would bring with it realisation that he would be liable to the employer if he failed to discharge that duty. But were that the law, and known by all concerned (including the contractor) to be the law, why should it tempt him to act other than independently or of itself cast doubt on his independence? The very nature of the architect's role in certifying would present a formidable task to an employer asserting that he had acted negligently, but, if clear proof of negligence is forthcoming (and in the present case it is uncontested), I should have thought that public policy required that he should be made to pay for it.

To my way of thinking, it is (to echo Romer LJ's² phrase) 'a lamentable conclusion' that an architect who negligently issues a certificate (interim or final), and thus places his employer in the position of having to pay under it, should be free of all liability. Nor do I find it easy to follow why, since (as is admitted in the present case) the architect is liable to the employer for negligence in supervision, he should be under no liability in respect of the incorrect certificate which, as a result of that inadequate supervision, he subsequently negligently issues. But such is the effect of *Chambers v Goldthorpe*³ regarding a final certificate, and, despite his valiant efforts, counsel for the plaintiff has not succeeded in persuading me that the nature of interim certificates is so different that they can be treated in any other way, and the observations of Denman J in *Stevenson v Watson*⁴ appear to indicate that he made no distinction between the two types of certificate.

I therefore have regretfully to say that I am for allowing this appeal and ordering judgment to be entered in favour of the defendants.

MEGAW LJ. Counsel for the plaintiff concedes that in this court the correctness of the decision in *Chambers v Goldthorpe*³ cannot be challenged. He desires to keep open the possibility of such a challenge in the House of Lords.

*Chambers v Goldthorpe*³ decided that an architect issuing a final certificate under the terms of a building contract, in the form of contract which existed in that case, a occupied the position of an arbitrator; hence the defendant building owner could not succeed in a counterclaim against the plaintiff architect on the ground of negligence by the architect in ascertaining and certifying the amount payable by the building owner to the contractor.

b The decision of the majority in *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ has been the subject of not a little adverse criticism. Thus, in a very powerful and persuasive judgment of a South African court, delivered by Ogilvie Thompson J in *Hoffman v Meyer*², the court refused to follow *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹, expressing a carefully reasoned and decided preference for the views expressed by Romer LJ in his dissenting judgment. Lord Denning MR in *Hosier & Dickinson Ltd v P & M Kaye Ltd*³ says that *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ 'has been much criticised, and will, if the occasion arises, have to be reconsidered.' In Hudson's Building and Engineering Contracts, there is criticism of *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ and considerable comment on what it is suggested are its unfortunate effects in practice.

c On the other hand, it may be thought that the speeches in the House of Lords in *Hickman & Co v Roberts*⁵, explained in *Panamena Europea Navigacion (Compania Limitada) v Frederick Leyland & Co Ltd*⁶, lend at least some support to the view that their Lordships accepted the general principles underlying the decision in *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ in respect of architects' certificates and of the arbitral status of an architect certifying under a building contract. In *R B Burden Ltd v Swansea Corp*⁷ Lord Radcliffe said:

e 'It is an established principle of law that, in granting a final certificate under a building contract, the architect acts in an arbitral capacity and is not "merely in the position of an agent for the building owner": Chambers v. Goldthorpe, *Restell v. Nye*¹.'

f It seems to follow from that decision that Lord Radcliffe was treating this as a principle of general application, at any rate in relation to final certificates, and that he did not regard it as being related to any special contractual provisions in the particular contract which was relevant in *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹. I think that for present purposes this must be accepted. It is not permissible to treat *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ as doing anything less than laying down what Lord Radcliffe⁷ describes as 'an established principle of law'.

g The issue in this case is whether a distinction can properly be drawn between the architect's negligence in issuing an interim certificate, on the one hand, and his negligence in issuing a final certificate, on the other hand. In the latter case, as I have said, it is conceded that in this court it has to be accepted that the architect is not liable: and that concession applies in respect of the particular contract here in question—the RIBA form of contract, 1963 edition.

The passage which I have cited from Lord Radcliffe's speech in *Burden v Swansea Corp*⁷ continued with this sentence:

h 'The considerations which give him [the architect] this arbitral position with regard to a final certificate are not necessarily applicable so as to place him in the same position with regard to each interim certificate.'

In *Wisbech Rural District Council v Ward*¹ Sankey J held that the principle of *Chambers v Goldthorpe*² did not apply to an interim certificate; but, with all respect, I do not find it clear on what grounds the learned judge based the distinction. His judgment was reversed by this court³ on the facts, and no views were expressed on the issues of law. Edmund Davies LJ has quoted the observation which Atkin LJ⁴ made, reserving consideration of the correctness of Sankey J's view on the question of the suggested distinction.

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the principle of *Chambers v Goldthorpe*² was, as he put it, 'suspect'; and that, though he could not invite this court to abrogate that suspect rule, we ought not to sanction the extension of its application to a wider field than is strictly required by the authority by which we are bound: that is, that the rule should be confined to cases in which it is the final certificate which is in question. The main criticism of the rule is that it is next to impossible to distinguish, whether as a matter of logic or practical common sense, between, on the one hand the architect's function of general supervision, in the exercise of which function he is unquestionably acting as the agent of the building owner and is liable for negligence, and, on the other hand, his function in preparing and issuing the certificate. Why should he be free from liability, as being an arbitrator, if in the certificate which issues he includes the cost of work which the contractor has not done, and which the architect ought to have known that he had not done; whereas he is unquestionably liable for negligence in his duty of general supervision if he has negligently failed to realise that the contractor has not done the work which he ought to have done and if loss or damage results from that failure?

While I see very great force in criticism such as that, I do not think that it is permissible or desirable to make an artificial distinction, where no true distinction exists. This is a sphere of the law in which certainty, or uniformity, is more important than subtlety. It would, on balance, be harmful if the question whether or not an architect were to have the immunity of an arbitrator in respect of the issue of certificates were to depend on minute and detailed analysis of individual clauses in the building contract, and the comparison of them with the clauses which were treated as relevant in earlier decided cases. Unless some real, relevant, logical or practical reason can be found for treating the arbitrator's legal position as being different when he issues interim certificates from that which it is when he issues a final certificate, I think we ought not to rely on some merely verbal or insubstantial difference as a ground for applying a different rule from that which binds us in respect of final certificates.

With regret, I have been unable to see what logical, or what practically relevant, distinction can be drawn between the architect's legal position vis-à-vis the building owner when the architect is issuing a final certificate and that which applies when he is issuing an interim certificate. It is, to my mind, odd, indeed, that an architect should be regarded as an arbitrator or (to use the phrase which is used in some of the cases) a 'quasi-arbitrator', when he issues a certificate, despite the fact that the relevant contract contains an arbitration clause in the proper sense of the word, providing for the appointment of an arbitrator in the proper sense of the word, and despite the fact that the issuing of the certificate, and its contents, may be the subject-matter of that arbitration properly so called. The architect is not so much a 'quasi-arbitrator' (the phrase used, but left undefined, in a number of cases) as, if I may coin a still less elegant phrase, a 'sub-quasi-arbitrator', the outcome of whose arbitrament is subject, as being a matter of dispute, to the arbitrament of an

a arbitrator properly so called. But I am forced to remind myself that in *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹ there was an arbitration clause, providing for arbitration properly so called, yet the architect was nonetheless held to be, himself, an arbitrator. It is true that it was a different arbitration clause from that which is to be found in the RIBA 1963 contract. But, as I have already said, I do not think that the question whether or not the architect has the status of an arbitrator should depend on a meticulous examination of contractual clauses.

b It is said that an important factor to be considered when it falls to be decided whether arbitral immunity is conferred on a person is the factor of finality. Is the decision—here the issue of the certificate—final and binding on the parties who seek the decision? I could see much force in that submission if it were not for the fact that we are bound by authority to treat a so-called ‘final’ certificate as giving arbitral immunity to the architect who issues it; and at least in the contract with which we are concerned, even the ‘final’ certificate is, by the provision of cl 30 (7), not ‘final’.

c The most that can be said for it is that it is rather less far away from finality than is the interim certificate.

d Agreeing, as I do, with the conclusion reached by Edmund Davies LJ, and with the reasons given by him, I feel bound, with regret, to hold that the appeal should be allowed, and that it should be held, on the authority of *Chambers v Goldthorpe*¹, that the defendant architects are not liable to the plaintiff employer for the loss caused to him by their negligence in the preparation and issuing of the two interim certificates.

e The other point, as to costs, raised by the notice of appeal does not now arise. If it had, I should have had no hesitation in holding that there was no ground for interfering with the learned judge’s discretion as to costs.

f SIR SEYMOUR KARMINSKI. I agree with the order proposed by Edmund Davies LJ and the reasons given by him in the course of his judgment. They were, if I may respectfully say so, so full that I do not feel called on to take any further time by elaborating on them.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal granted.

S was the registered proprietor of a car repair business but she took no part in its conduct or control. At all material times the business was under the control of the respondent who was in charge of the workshop. A customer brought his car to the workshop for a new sill to be welded on to it. When the customer collected the car he was handed an invoice which stated that a new sill had been welded. In fact the sill had not been welded. S was charged with recklessly making a false statement contrary to s 14 (1) (b)^a of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. The respondent was charged with an offence under s 23^b of the 1968 Act on the ground that the commission of the offence by S had been due to his default. The justices dismissed the information against S finding that although she was the registered owner of the business she personally neither made nor authorised nor was even aware of the making of the false statement, and that in any event she had a valid defence under s 24^c of the 1968 Act. The justices found that the respondent had made a false statement and had made it recklessly, but that as they had acquitted S it was not open to them to convict the respondent of the offence charged under s 23. On appeal by the prosecutor,

Held – A person could only be charged with an offence under s 23 when an offence under the Act had been committed, or would have been committed but for the statutory defence under s 24, by another person. An offence under s 14 (1) required knowledge or recklessness on the part of the offender. Accordingly S had been properly acquitted since she did not herself have the requisite mens rea, and the mens rea of the respondent could not be attributed to her. It followed therefore that, since no offence against s 14 (1) had been committed by S, quite apart from the defence under s 24, the respondent could not be charged with or convicted of the offence under s 23 (see p 1062 a d to g and j to p 1063 a and c d, post).

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the Middlesex area of Greater London acting in and for the petty sessional division of Brentford, in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Brentford on 7th June 1972.

On 4th April 1972 an information was preferred by the appellant, Marshall William Coupe, against the respondent, Colin Edward Alfred Guyett, that on 16th June 1971 at 195 Hanworth Road, Hounslow, Middlesex, Ruth Jane Shaw trading as Advance Autos in the course of the trade or business of motor repairer recklessly made a statement, namely 'Cut away n/s sill and weld', which was false as to the nature of a service, viz, the repair of a Cortina MK II motor vehicle, provided in the course of the trade or business, contrary to s 14 (1) (b) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968; and that the commission of that offence was due to the default of the respondent whereby he was guilty of an offence, contrary to s 23 of the Act.

The justices heard the information, together with another information against Ruth Jane Shaw alleging an offence contrary to s 14 (1) (b) of the Act which referred to the same statement, on 7th June 1972 and found the following facts: (1) Miss Shaw, who was an airline hostess by occupation, was at all material times registered under the Registration of Business Names Act 1916 as the sole proprietor of a car repair business known as Advance Autos at 195 Hanworth Road, Hounslow. She had invested £200 in the business but took no part whatsoever in its conduct or control. (2) At all material times the business was under the conduct and control of the respondent, who was in charge of the workshop, and a Mr Humphrey, who also ran another garage at Teddington, who was in charge of the administration side of the business. (3) In June 1971 Bernard Thomas Richard Bill, who was anxious that his Cortina II motor car should have a respray and a new sill fitted, brought the car to the garage where he saw the respondent who gave him a verbal estimate of £65 for the work which was accepted. (4) On the following day, 16th June, Mr Bill brought the car in for the repairs, and the respondent wrote out that day on a form which he used as a job-sheet, and a copy of which was subsequently handed to Mr Bill as an invoice, the words 'To cut away N/S sill and weld in new panel', being the work Mr Bill required. (5) The following week Mr Bill collected his car and was handed the invoice. He paid the sum of £74 cash in the belief that the work set out in the invoice had been done. (6) On the following day Mr Bill formed the view that the sill had been pop-riveted, not welded, but when he returned to the garage the respondent tried to tell him that it had been welded and that he had no intention of doing any further work on the car and refused point blank to discuss the matter further. (7) On 17th November 1971 the respondent was seen by Mr Waite, a senior officer of the weights and measures department of the London Borough of Hounslow, to whom he insisted that a new sill had been welded on to the car and that it had been offered to the side, spot welded underneath and bent down and spot welded at the bottom and then riveted. (8) On 3rd December 1971 the sill was examined by Mr Gillett, a consulting engineer, who found no evidence of welding anywhere and whose report the justices accepted. (9) The respondent was in charge of the workshop but did not adequately supervise the work which was carried out by a panel beater.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant: (1) that a false statement had been made recklessly on the invoice of Advance Autos and that even if Miss Shaw, the registered proprietor of that business, succeeded in setting up a defence under s 24 of the Act, the respondent was still liable to be convicted if the justices were satisfied that Advance Autos had committed an offence under the Act due to his act or default;

(2) that the statement on the invoice was false, that it had been made recklessly, and that the respondent who made it, and who was responsible for its accuracy, was therefore liable, because of the effect of s 23 of the Act. a

The respondent, who appeared in person, did not ask questions of any of the witnesses called on behalf of the appellant and did not give sworn evidence, but made an unsworn statement and answered some questions the justices put to him. He made no contentions of law to the justices. b

The justices dismissed the summons against Miss Shaw on the grounds that, although she was the registered owner of Advance Autos, she personally neither made nor authorised nor was she even aware of the making of the false statement and that in any event she had a valid defence under s 24 of the Act. b

The justices were of the opinion (1) that the respondent had made the statement in the invoice, for whose accuracy he was responsible, recklessly and the statement was false; but (2) that since they had decided to acquit Miss Shaw of an offence under s 14 (1) of the 1968 Act it was not open to them to convict the respondent of the offence charged under s 23 of the 1968 Act on the true construction of that section. Accordingly they dismissed the summons against the respondent. c

The questions for the opinion of the High Court were: (1) if a summons under s 14 (1) (b) of the 1968 Act against a principal offender was dismissed, was it open to the court on the same occasion to convict the person through whose act or default the alleged offence had been committed if all the other ingredients of ss 14 (1) (b) and 23 of the Act were proved against that person? (2) did they come to a correct determination in point of law? d

The case first came before the court (Lord Widgery CJ, Eveleigh and May JJ) on 25th January 1973 when it was adjourned for counsel to be instructed as amicus curiae. e

The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the Middlesex area of Greater London sitting at Brentford in respect of their adjudication on 7th June 1972. In April 1972 an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent that on 16th June 1971 at an address in Middlesex, Ruth Jane Shaw, trading as Advance Autos, in the course of the trade or business of motor repairer did recklessly make a statement namely: f

“Cut away n/s sill and weld” which was false as to the nature of a service viz: the repair of a Cortina MK II motor vehicle provided in the course of the said trade or business, contrary to Section 14 (1) (b) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968; And that the commission of the said offence was due to the default of the [respondent] whereby he is guilty of an offence, contrary to Section 23 of the said Act. g

The information was heard together with a parallel information against the Miss Shaw referred to, and in her case it was alleged that she had committed an offence under s 14 (1) (b) of the 1968 Act. Miss Shaw is an airline hostess by occupation, and was at the material time registered under the Registration of Business Names Act 1916 as the sole proprietor a car repair business trading as Advance Autos at this address in Middlesex. However, at all material times the business was under the conduct and the control of the respondent, who was in charge of the workshop, and there was another gentleman, a Mr Humphrey, who looked after administration. h

The facts giving rise to the charge were that in June 1971 a Mr Bill wanted his Cortina car to be resprayed and have a new sill fitted. He brought it to the garage of Advance Autos, and naturally enough saw the respondent and not Miss Shaw, i a because Miss Shaw was not normally in attendance on the premises. He told the respondent what he wanted, he was given a verbal estimate for the work which was to be done, and on the following day, 16th June, Mr Bill brought the car in for repairs and the respondent made a note of the work which was to be done; that note subsequently became the invoice rendered by the respondent to Mr Bill in respect of work, and in that invoice, as I will now call it, it is in terms described that the work to be done, or the work then done, included 'Cut away [nearside] sill and weld'.

b Mr Bill was not very satisfied that the work had been done, and evidence was given before the justices that the sill had not been welded at all, but had been riveted, and the justices found, I imagine without very much difficulty, that the statement was a false statement, because the invoice properly interpreted meant that the sill had been welded when in fact it had not.

c Section 14 of the Act, which is the relevant section, is, insofar as material, in these terms:

'(1) It shall be an offence for any person in the course of any trade or business—
(a) to make a statement which he knows to be false; or (b) recklessly to make a statement which is false; as to any of the following matters, that is to say . . .
(ii) the nature of any services, accommodation or facilities provided in the d course of any trade or business . . .'

The respondent therefore had made a statement which was false; he had made it in the course of the trade or business, and the justices found that he had made it recklessly. It seems to me, therefore, although we need not decide the point today, that had the respondent been directly charged with an offence under s 14, he would almost certainly have been properly convicted. The statement made by him was e false, and the justices found it was made recklessly.

The problems in this case have arisen because the charge against the respondent was not a direct charge of an offence under s 14, but an indirect approach provided by ss 23 and 24 of the same Act. Section 23 provides:

f 'Where the commission by any person of an offence under this Act is due to the act or default of some other person that other person shall be guilty of the offence, and a person may be charged with and convicted of the offence by virtue of this section whether or not proceedings are taken against the first-mentioned person.'

Section 24 is also relevant, and I will read it before going back to s 23:

g '(1) In any proceedings for an offence under this Act it shall, subject to subsection (2) of this section, be a defence for the person charged to prove—(a) that the commission of the offence was due to a mistake or to reliance on information supplied to him or to the act or default of another person, an accident or some other cause beyond his control . . .'

h Certain other requirements are specified in the section, but those are the essential ones for present purposes. At first sight there appears to be something of a conflict between ss 23 and 24, because s 23 contemplates that the person first referred to therein shall have committed an offence by reason of the act or default of another. When one moves on to s 24, it becomes apparent that someone who has otherwise committed an offence but has done it through the act or default of another has a j special statutory defence. Accordingly it is difficult at first sight to see how the two sections can be fitted together. But the conflict has been resolved, and one can seek guidance on it in the speech of Lord Diplock in *Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass*¹. The solution of the conflict is this, that when a person first named in s 23 has no defence to the charge except the statutory defence under s 24, he or she can properly still be regarded as having committed the offence for the purpose of s 23. On the other hand, in my judgment, if the person first referred to in s 23 has a defence on the merits, as it were, and without reference to s 24, then it is not possible to operate s 23 so as to render guilty the person whose act or default gave rise to the matter in complaint. a

With that for background, one must now attempt to see what the justices made of the position of Miss Shaw. The prosecution were clearly saying that Miss Shaw and the respondent were guilty, subject of course to Miss Shaw's defence under s 24 but not otherwise. The justices took a different view. Their actual words were: b

'We dismissed the summons against Miss Shaw on the grounds that although she was the registered owner of Advance Autos, she personally neither made nor authorised nor was she even aware of the making of the false statement and that in any event she had a valid defence under section 24 of the Act.' c

If the justices had taken the view that Miss Shaw was to be acquitted solely because of the statutory defence, then for the reasons I have already given it would have been open to them to convict the respondent. If on the other hand they were right in saying that Miss Shaw was entitled to be acquitted on other grounds, then they would not be in a position to convict the respondent under the terms of s 23. Accordingly counsel for the appellant has been faced with the somewhat uphill task of trying to satisfy us that the justices were wrong in law when they concluded that Miss Shaw should be acquitted on grounds other than the grounds of the statutory defence. If he can do that, then of course the conviction of the respondent must follow; if he cannot, then the acquittal of the respondent was in my judgment right. d

In order to allege that Miss Shaw was guilty of the offence and was able only to rely on her defence under s 24, counsel for the appellant has to urge and establish that not only the statement made by the respondent, the falsity of which gave rise to the proceedings, but also the mental state of the respondent must be attributed to Miss Shaw. I think, without deciding it, that in these circumstances it may well be right to say that the statement can properly be attributed to Miss Shaw, because after all, it was her business, and the statement was made on behalf of the business. So far as that point is concerned I could be easily persuaded that the making of the statement simpliciter could be attributed to Miss Shaw, the principal. e

But that is not enough unless one can also attribute to her the state of mind alleged, namely that the statement was made recklessly. As I understand it, as a general proposition of the criminal law a principal is not to be made immediately liable, in an offence involving mens rea, merely because his servant or agent had the necessary mental intent. As a question of general principle I would have thought it wrong to allow the mental state of the respondent to be attributed to Miss Shaw so as to complete the offence so far as she is concerned. f

Counsel for the appellant has ranged widely over the rest of the Act and has referred us, as I have said, to Lord Diplock's speech in the Tesco case¹ to show that generally speaking the scheme of this Act is to make the employer liable in the first instance, subject to his possible defence under s 24, and that that should be so in cases of strict liability is not I think suprising. It is the case that most, if not all, of the other offences under this Act are offences of strict obligation; and it seems to me consistent with principle in those cases that the employer should be the person primarily responsible when an infringement occurs. g

But s 14 of the Act is peculiar in many ways. It deals with services, and deals with services for the first time, because they were not dealt with in the Merchandise Marks Acts 1887 to 1953 and also contains the specific mental element of knowledge of falsity or recklessness to which I have already referred. For my part I do not think it h a would be consistent with principle or required by the terms of this Act, looked at as a whole, that the mental element attributed properly to the respondent should be also attributed to Miss Shaw in the circumstances of this case.

I recognise that the situation may appear at all events to be somewhat different where the employer in a case of this kind is a limited company, because again it is established in principle that the actions and the state of mind of the ruling officers of a company may be attributed to the company. Accordingly, somewhat different considerations may apply in those circumstances. Here we have no question of a company, we have two individuals, and I think the result should be as I have stated.

b This may mean, of course, that the defence under s 24 will rarely, if ever, be appropriate to a charge under s 14. I say that because, if I am right, in order to establish the charge under s 14 you have to show knowing falsity or recklessness, which themselves are inconsistent with the statutory defence. But be that as it may, I think in this case the justices were entirely justified in saying that Miss Shaw was to be acquitted on the general grounds as opposed to the statutory defence, and once they reached that conclusion it was inevitable, having regard to the form of the charge, that they should acquit the respondent as well. For those reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

g Employment – Redundancy – Dismissal by reason of redundancy – Cessation of or diminution in requirements of business for employees to carry out work of particular kind – Test to be applied – Whether account to be taken of terms and conditions of employment of employee claiming redundancy payment – Employees brought to work from long distance at employers' expense – Provision of transport ceasing to be economic – Employers withdrawing transport – Employees dismissed by reason of employers' repudiation of contract – Employers engaging other men living nearby in place of dismissed employees – Whether employees dismissed by reason of redundancy – Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 1 (2) (b).

h The appellants were employed by the respondents in their china clay works, which were some 30 miles from the place where the appellants lived. The appellants and three other men, making a party of ten in all, were taken to and from their work each day in a bus paid for by the respondents. That service cost the respondents £20 per week. There was a recession in the china clay industry and the respondents decided to reduce their labour force by 12 men. Nine were chosen because they were over age and due for retirement; the remaining three chosen were those with the shortest service. It happened that those were the three who came with the seven appellants in the bus party. In consequence the appellants were told that the respondents could no longer provide the bus service for them because its cost would no longer be justified. The appellants had no other means of getting to work and so they gave notice to terminate their employment. By withdrawing the bus service the respondents were in breach of contract and in consequence the appellants were entitled to treat themselves as having been dismissed by the respondents. The appellants claimed that they had been dismissed by reason of redundancy, by virtue of s 1 (2) (b)^a of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, since they had been dismissed because the requirements of the respondents' business for employees to carry out the work which the appellants had been doing had ceased or diminished; they contended that the 'requirements of [the] business for employees to carry out work of a particular kind', referred to in s 1 (2) (b), meant requirements for employees to carry out the work on which the appellants had been engaged on the terms and conditions of the appellants' contracts of employment, and the requirements of the respondents' business for the work to be carried out on those terms and conditions had ceased or diminished.

Held – Section 1 (2) (b) could not be read as if it included the words 'on the existing terms and conditions of employment'. The test under s 1 (2) (b) was simply whether there had been a cessation of, or diminution in, the requirements of the respondents' business for employees to carry out the kind of work on which the appellants had been engaged. On the evidence the respondents' requirements for employees to carry out that kind of work had neither ceased nor diminished for they had employed other men to do the work; nor had the appellants been dismissed because the respondents expected their need for employees to do that work to cease or diminish. Accordingly the appellants had not been dismissed by reason of redundancy (see p 1065 h, p 1067 a and f, p 1069 d and e, p 1070 h to p 1071 a and p 1072 c to f, post).

Appeals

The claimants, William Francis Chapman, Christopher George Hallett, Francis Henry Ford, Arthur William Chadband, Robert William Melhuish, John Henry Ford and Thomas John Avery appealed against the judgment of the National Industrial Relations Court¹ (Sir John Donaldson P, Mr J H Arkell and Mr R Davis) given on 9th November 1972 dismissing their appeals against the decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman John Shaw Esq QC) sitting at Truro, Cornwall, dated 15th June 1972, whereby the claimants' applications for the payment of redundancy payments by their employers, Goonvean & Rostowrack China Clay Co Ltd, were dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

Peter Pain QC and James Mitchell for the claimants.

Alexander Irvine and Eldred Tabachnic for the employers.

16th April. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR. The china clay industry has been very active in Cornwall in recent years. So much so that a firm at St Stephen in the south has drawn men a from Port Isaac in the north. That is 30 miles away along the narrow winding roads of those parts. There is no public transport. So the firm provided a bus to take the men to and from the works. This was imported as a term in their contract of employment. So they were entitled by contract to free transport to work. The industrial tribunal so found.

^a Section 1 (2), so far as material, is set out at p 1065 g, post

b In March 1972 there were ten men regularly travelling by the bus from Port Isaac to St Stephen and back. Then there was a trade recession in the china clay industry. The firm decided to dismiss 12 out of their 220 men. Nine were selected because they were over age and due for retirement. That left three to be made redundant. The firm selected the three with the shortest service. All three happened to be men from Port Isaac. Those three got redundancy payments. But the dismissal of those three had an unfortunate result on the bus service. It cost the firm £20 a week. That expense was justified when the bus carried ten men to and c fro, but it was not economic for seven men. So the firm decided to cut off the bus service and leave the seven men to find their own way to work. The firm told these seven that work was still available for them if they were prepared to make their own arrangements to get to work. But none of them could make such arrangements. Only two had cars, and those were old and unsuitable and the insurers refused d to give passenger cover. So those seven told the firm that they could not get to work and would have to give up. The firm were reluctant to lose them as they were good men, but they could not see their way to pay the expense of the bus. So the seven men left and the firm replaced them by seven other men who lived at or near St Stephen.

e The seven Port Isaac men then claimed that they had been dismissed for redundancy. They claimed redundancy payments. The industrial tribunal rejected the claim. Their decision was affirmed by the National Industrial Relations Court¹. The men appeal to this court.

f There is no doubt that the seven men were 'dismissed' by the employers. The employers' conduct (in withdrawing the bus in breach of the contract) amounted to a repudiation which entitled the men to terminate their contract: see s 3 (1) (c) of the 1965 Act. Although the seven men were 'dismissed', the question is whether they were dismissed 'by reason of redundancy'. This depends on s 1 (2) of the Act which, so far as material, says:

g '... an employee who is dismissed shall be taken to be dismissed by reason of redundancy if the dismissal is attributable wholly or mainly to ... (b) the fact that the requirements of that business for employees to carry out work of a particular kind, or for employees to carry out work of a particular kind in the place where he was so employed, have ceased or diminished or are expected to cease or diminish.'

h Taking those words as they stand, this case is not one of dismissal for redundancy. The requirements of the business—for the work of these seven men—continued just the same as before. After they stopped work, the firm had to take on seven other men to replace them and to do the work that they had been doing. The requirements for work of that kind in that place had not ceased or diminished, nor were they expected to do so. So it would seem that the case does not come within the statute.

i But the men say that the words of the section cannot be taken as they stand. They point out that the employers sought to alter the terms of the contract of employment to the disadvantage of the men. They took away the free transport and left the men to pay their own travelling expenses. This free transport cost the firm £2 a week for each man (£20 for ten men, £2 for each man). It would cost the men much about the same. So it would mean that the men would take home £2 a week less. If the employers sought to reduce wages by that sum—and the men refused to accept the reduction—would not it be a dismissal for redundancy? So say the men.

There are two cases in the Divisional Court which support the men's case. The first is *Dutton v C H Bailey Ltd*¹. Dutton had been employed for nearly 20 years as a boilermaker. In 1967 the employers considered that there were too many restrictive practices and tried to get the employees' society to agree to do away with them. The employees' society refused. Thereupon the employers told the men that, if they wished to continue to work, they would have to agree to new working rules and conditions. Dutton refused to agree. So did all the other boilermakers. In consequence, the employers told him that his labour was not required. The industrial tribunal held that he was not dismissed by reason of redundancy. They said:

'We find that the reason for the employers' termination of the old contract is that they wished—wisely or unwisely—to impose or attempt to impose new terms upon their work force. It was not because of any existing or expected reduction in the need for boilermakers.'

The Divisional Court reversed the tribunal. Lord Parker CJ said that² 'the proper approach is to say what in all the circumstances would have happened if these men had been retained on the old terms'.

In *Line v C E White & Co*³ two men were employed in a joinery shop at time rates. The employers were dissatisfied with the work being turned out on that basis and offered the men piece rates instead. The men refused to accept it and were dismissed. The industrial tribunal found that the men were dismissed because they would not accept the new terms. It was not because there was any falling off in work. So the tribunal rejected the claim for redundancy payment. The Divisional Court reversed the tribunal. They held that the case was governed by *Dutton v C H Bailey Ltd*¹.

If those two cases were correctly decided, they do show that if an employer seeks to alter the terms and conditions of employment to the disadvantage of the men, and the men do not accept it, they can treat themselves as dismissed for redundancy. The Industrial Court⁴ held, however, that those two cases were wrongly decided. They declined to follow them. The question for us is whether those two cases were right or wrong.

Counsel for the claimants sought to uphold the decisions in those two cases. He submitted that s 1 (2) (b) of the Act is to be read with s 2 (3) and (4), and other sections of the 1965 Act. So read, he says that s 1 (2) (b) is to be read as if it included the words 'on the existing terms and conditions of employment' at an appropriate place.

During the argument I was much attracted by this submission, but, on further consideration, I do not think it is right. I will take s 2 (3) and (4) on which counsel principally relied. Those subsections are intended to cover cases where a man has been given notice by reason of redundancy but afterwards, before he actually leaves, the employer makes a new offer to him. Thus s 2 (3) is apt to cover a case where, owing to lack of orders, an employer gives notice to a number of his men. But afterwards, before they leave his employ, more orders come in and the employer changes his mind. He makes an offer to the men, or some of them, to renew their contract or to re-employ them on the same work at the same place on the same terms. If the employee unreasonably refuses the offer, it is a bar to redundancy payment.

Section 2 (4) is apt to cover similar cases, but the employer does not offer the employee the same, but different. He offers him other work which may differ in kind and in place and on different terms. If the work is suitable for him and he unreasonably refuses it, it is a bar to redundancy payment. So construed, s 2 (3) and (4) do not affect s 1 (2) (b). They only apply after a man has been dismissed for redundancy

2 [1968] 2 Lloyd's Rep at 123

3 (1969) 4 ITR 336

whereas s 1 (2) applies at the time when he is dismissed. It defines the cases in which a man is to be taken to be dismissed for redundancy.

I come back, therefore, to s 1 (2) (b); and I am afraid that I cannot read into it the words 'on the existing terms and conditions of employment'. I think the two cases were wrongly decided. I have less hesitation in overruling them because I notice that Lord Parker CJ¹ himself decided as he did with reluctance; and I can see why. It is very desirable, in the interests of efficiency, that employers should be able to propose changes in the terms of a man's employment for such reasons as these: so as to get rid of restrictive practices; or to induce higher output by piece work; or to cease to provide free transport at an excessive cost. Take an instance very like the present case. The employers are able to obtain all the labour they need from places near their works without paying travelling expenses. So, as vacancies occur, they replace them locally and gradually reduce the number of men coming from a distance. The number falls so low that it is an unwarranted expense to provide a bus to bring them. Are employers then to keep on a bus so as to bring seven, six, five or a less number of men to work? Clearly not. The employers can properly say to the men: 'You have not lost your jobs because you are redundant. You have lost your jobs because you live so far away that it is not worth our while paying the cost of bringing you here—when we can get all the men we need nearby.' So, in *Dutton v C H Bailey Ltd*² the men did not lose their jobs because they were redundant. They lost them because they were parties to restrictive practices and refused to alter them. Likewise in *Line v C E White & Co*³ the men lost their jobs, not because they were redundant, but because they insisted on being paid on a time basis which was unproductive.

I would, however, remark, that if an employer sought to reduce the wages of his men on the plea that otherwise he could not keep the business going—or if he employed women in the place of men to save expenses—with the result that some men lost their jobs, then I think the employer would have difficulty in resisting a claim. There is a presumption that the men were dismissed by reason of redundancy: see s 9 (2) (b). I expect that the tribunal would in those circumstances hold that the presumption was not rebutted. The reduction in wages would probably be because a redundancy situation had arisen, or was expected to arise. Such is not the case here. These men did not lose their jobs because they were redundant. They lost them because they lived too far away to make it worth while to pay the cost of bringing them in.

I agree with the Industrial Court⁴ and would dismiss the appeal.

BUCKLEY LJ. The question for decision in this case is whether the seven claimants, who are appellants in this court, are entitled to receive redundancy payments from the employers under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. They had all been in the employers' employment for the requisite period. Under s 1 (1) of the Act such an employee is entitled to receive a redundancy payment from his employer if he has been dismissed by his employer by reason of redundancy. Dismissal for the purposes of the Act can occur in four ways: (1) by summary dismissal, (2) by dismissal on notice, (3) by effluxion of a fixed term of employment, (4) by the employee summarily determining the contract of employment where the conduct of the employer entitles him to do so (s 3 (1)). Section 9 (2) (b) provides that an employee who has been dismissed by his employer shall, unless the contrary is proved, be presumed to have been so dismissed by reason of redundancy. The claimants were dismissed from their employment by the employers, and accordingly

1 In Dutton v C H Bailey Ltd [1968] 2 Lloyd's Rep 122

2 [1968] 2 Lloyd's Rep 122

4 [1973] 1 All ER 218, [1972] 1 WLR 1634

the burden of proving that they were not dismissed by reason of redundancy lies on the employers. Section 1 (2), so far as relevant to the present case, provides that for the purposes of the Act an employee who is dismissed shall be taken to be dismissed by reason of redundancy if the dismissal is attributable wholly or mainly to the fact that the requirements of the business for the purposes of which he was employed for employees to carry out work of a particular kind have ceased or diminished or are expected to cease or diminish. So the burden resting on the employers in the present case is to establish that on the facts of the case that criterion is not satisfied. a

Lord Denning MR has already recounted the history of the matter and I need not repeat the facts.

Counsel for the claimants has contended that on the facts they were dismissed because the requirements of the employer's business for employees to carry out the work which the claimants were doing was expected to cease or diminish. Such expectations must depend on the circumstances and manner in which it is anticipated that the employer will carry on the business in the future. Counsel contends that on the true interpretation of the Act it should be assumed for this purpose that the employer will continue to carry on the business as it was carried on during the employment of the claimant of the redundancy payment, that is to say, continuing to employ the claimant on the terms and conditions on which he was employed down to the date of his dismissal. In support of this contention, counsel relied on the context of the 1965 Act as a whole and in particular of s 2 (3), and (4). He also relies on two decisions¹ of the Divisional Court, to which I will refer later. Stated shortly and in colloquial terms, s 2 (3) provides that an employee shall not be entitled to a redundancy payment if before his dismissal takes effect his employer has offered that he shall have his job back on the same terms as before without any interruption of employment and the employee has unreasonably refused that offer. Section 2 (4) provides that an employee shall not be entitled to a redundancy payment if before his dismissal takes effect his employer has offered to re-employ him, not necessarily in the same job, but in suitable employment to take effect not more than four weeks after the date of his dismissal and the employee has unreasonably refused that offer. Counsel contends that these two subsections should be read as provisos to, or modifications of, the provisions of s 1 conferring the right to a redundancy payment. He suggests that, so read, those provisions of the Act demonstrate that the policy of the legislature was that the employee should be safeguarded in a job at least as beneficial to him as his job was before his dismissal. c

Section 2 (3) and (4) are complementary to s 3 (2) (a) and (b). I have already referred to s 3 (1) which defines dismissal for the purposes of the Act. Section 3 (2) deals with cases which would otherwise fall within sub-s (1) of the section, in which the employee is not to be treated as having been dismissed. Section 3 (2) reads as follows: g

'An employee shall not be taken for the purposes of this Part of this Act to be dismissed by his employer if his contract of employment is renewed, or he is re-engaged by the same employer under a new contract of employment, and—
(a) in a case where the provisions of the contract as renewed, or of the new contract, as the case may be, as to the capacity and place in which he is employed, and as to the other terms and conditions of his employment, do not differ from the corresponding provisions of the previous contract, the renewal or re-engagement takes effect immediately on the ending of his employment under the previous contract, or (b) in any other case, the renewal or re-engagement is in pursuance of an offer in writing made by his employer before the ending of his employment under the previous contract, and takes effect either immediately on the ending of that employment or after an interval of not more than four weeks thereafter.'

a So, if an employee before his dismissal takes effect gets his old job back on the same terms as before he is not to be treated as dismissed (s 3 (2) (a)); but if he is offered this and unreasonably refuses, his dismissal takes effect but he is entitled to no redundancy payment (s 2 (3)). If, on the other hand, before his dismissal takes effect he is offered a new job by his employer or his old job on different terms, to start not later than four weeks after his dismissal takes effect, he is not to be treated as having been dismissed (s 3 (2) (b)). If the employer makes such an offer as last referred to and it is b an offer of suitable employment in relation to the employee and the employee unreasonably refuses it, his dismissal takes effect but he is entitled to no redundancy payment (s 2 (4)).

c In a case falling within s 3 (2) the employee is not to be treated as having been dismissed, and so no question of dismissal by reason of redundancy can arise. Section 2 (3) and (4) on the other hand both start with the words 'An employee shall not be entitled to a redundancy payment by reason of dismissal if ...' Here 'dismissal' must d of necessity refer to dismissal by reason of redundancy, for it is only in that case that an employee can be entitled to a redundancy payment. Starting from the statutory presumption under s 9 (2) (b) that an employee who has been dismissed by his employer has been so dismissed by reason of redundancy, the next logical step is to consider whether the employer can displace that presumption by establishing that e the criterion contained in s 1 (1) is not satisfied. It is only if the employer is unsuccessful in doing so that s 2 (3) or (4) can come into play. There is consequently, in my judgment, no justification for giving to s 1 (2) by reason of the provisions contained in s 2 any other meaning than that which its language primarily bears unless such a construction of s 1 (2) would produce results which it cannot reasonably be supposed f that Parliament intended.

e I will therefore first consider the terms of s 1 (2) without reference to the provisions of s 2. Where an employer has ceased or intends to cease to carry on the business in which the employee has been employed, either altogether or in the place where the employee was so employed (see s 1 (2) (a)), it seems to me that there is likely to be little difficulty in establishing the relevant facts. So also, where the requirement of the employer's business for employees to carry out work of a particular kind has f ceased, either altogether or at the place where the employee is employed, proof of the relevant facts should cause no probable difficulty. We are concerned, however, with a case in which it is said that the requirement of the employer's business for employees to carry out work of a particular kind was expected to cease or diminish. Whether such an expectation can justifiably be said to have existed must depend on g the circumstances in which it was supposed that the business would be conducted in the future. The test cannot, I think, be a purely subjective one, depending only on the apprehensions, justified or unjustified, of the employer. The employer must, I think, justify his expectation by reference to objective circumstances relating to the commercial situation of his business and those commercial and economic conditions h which exist generally at the relevant time or which could then reasonably be anticipated in the future. There seems to me, however, to be nothing in the language of the section to suggest that the employer should be treated as bound or likely to carry on his business in all, or indeed in any, respects in precisely the way in which he was carrying it on at the time when the facts have to be considered.

i Suppose, for instance, that the employment is of a kind for which there is a recognised rate for the job, and that an employer in a period of affluence and in the interests of good staff relations has been paying his employees more than that rate. If a time comes when he can no longer afford to pay his employees more than the recognised rate for the job but he is prepared to continue to employ them at that rate, there is nothing in s 1 of the 1965 Act to suggest that for the purpose of considering whether his requirement for employees to do that particular job is likely to cease or diminish he must be treated as an employer who is going to continue to pay the higher rate. This, however, as I understand counsel's argument, would be the consequence of the view which he propounds. The facts would not, it seems to me, establish that the employer's need for employees to carry out work of the particular kind was expected to cease or diminish, but only that the employer was no longer able to pay his employees on so generous a scale as before. The position would be quite different if an employer dismissed his employees because he was no longer able to pay them either the recognised rate for the job, where one existed, or a fair wage at which he could secure the services of other employees in the labour market.

In *Dutton v C H Bailey Ltd*¹ the respondent company attempted to impose on its boilermaker employees, including the appellant Dutton, new terms of employment which seem to have affected not rates of pay but conditions of employment involving the removal of restrictive practices, the increase of mobility, the discontinuance of the employment of a mate to work with each boilermaker and matters of that sort. The changes were no doubt designed to make the company's labour force more productive and less expensive without altering rates of pay. The industrial tribunal decided that the case was not a redundancy case because the reason for the termination of the old contracts of employment was not any existing or expected reduction of the need for boilermakers. On appeal the Divisional Court¹ reversed the decision of the industrial tribunal. Lord Parker CJ said²:

'In my judgment, however, the Tribunal approached this in the wrong way. It seems to me that the proper approach is to say what in all the circumstances would have happened if these men had been retained on the old terms. To that there is only one answer as it seems to me, and that is that the requirements for boilermakers would diminish and possibly cease in that the employers would no longer be able, as they themselves said, to offer a competitive service. In other words, this was a case where, if instead of saying: "Unless you enter into new terms you will be dismissed", they at first dismissed these men and later, on sought to negotiate new terms, it would then as it seems to me be perfectly clear that the dismissal was one on account of the expected diminution or cessation in the work for boilermakers. It is in my judgment nihil ad rem to look to the future and say what would have happened if this man had accepted these new terms. It may be then that the employers would have had so much work that they would even want more boilermakers. The test, it seems to me, is what would have happened if termination of the contract had not been effected.'

In the later case of *Line v C E White & Co*³ the appellants were employed by the respondent company in its joinery shop on time rates. The company, being dissatisfied with the amount of work turned out for the hours worked, decided to offer them new contracts on piece rates. The appellants refused to accept the change in their contracts, and were thereupon dismissed. The industrial tribunal held that the cases were not cases of redundancy, but on appeal the Divisional Court followed its earlier decision in *Dutton v C H Bailey Ltd*¹.

With the utmost respect to the learned judges who were concerned with those two decisions, I am unable to see any justification in the language of s 1 for the test adopted by the Divisional Court. The section does not pose the question, what might be expected to happen if the employees were not dismissed but continued under their prior contracts of employment. It poses the question whether the employers' requirement for employees to carry out work of the particular kind in question is expected to cease or diminish. That is a question which needs to be answered objectively in the light of all the circumstances affecting the employers' business, but not, in my opinion, with any special relation to the particular contracts of employment a under which the dismissed employees were previously employed. It may be that on their particular facts, which are shortly recorded in the books, *Dutton v C H Bailey Ltd*¹ and *Line v C E White & Co*² were correctly decided, but, in my judgment, they should not be taken as laying down a general principle.

Assuming then that I am right in thinking that s 1 should be interpreted in the way I have indicated, can s 2 (3) and (4) operate in conjunction with s 1 in a sensible manner, or do they give rise to any consequences of so surprising a character as to suggest that s 1 must have been misinterpreted?

b At first impression it may seem strange that, where an employee immediately on the termination of his existing contract of employment could get his job back on the same terms, a redundancy situation can exist, and yet s 2 (3) and (4), as I have already indicated, postulate a redundancy situation. It is a mistake, however, to think of the Act as operating in relation to one employee alone. It must normally c operate in circumstances in which an employer is reducing his labour force by laying off a number of workpeople. We are not, I think, concerned under s 2 (3) and (4) with cases in which the contract of service is summarily determined by either the employer or the employee. We are concerned with cases of dismissal on notice or termination of employment by effluxion of time.

d Suppose an employer to employ 20 men on a particular type of work and to wish to reduce that number to 15 because he has not, or does not expect to have, work for more. He may give five men a month's notice, but before the month is out he may lose two of the remaining 15 men for some reason or other and so want to retain two of the five. He offers to renew the employment of two of them on the same terms as before. If they accept, their employment will continue as though they had never been given notice. They will be treated as though they had never been dismissed e (s 3 (2) (a)). But if, when he is offered his job back, one of the two unreasonably refuses the offer, he will fall within s 2 (3). He will have been dismissed by reason of redundancy because, when he was given notice, the employer expected that the need for his services would cease, but he will not qualify for a redundancy payment because, notwithstanding his dismissal by reason of redundancy, he need not have lost his f job in consequence.

g Or suppose that the 20 men in the previous example are all employed for fixed periods and that the periods of employment of seven of them are due to expire on the same day. Two of these are re-employed on the same terms as before and the other five are not re-engaged. All seven would have been dismissed within the meaning of that word in this Act (s 3 (1)) and all such dismissals would have occurred in a redundancy situation. Were it not for s 2 (3), it might be difficult to say that the two who were re-engaged were not entitled to redundancy payments.

I have no doubt that a number of other examples could be devised in which s 2 (3) could serve a useful purpose without, as it seems to me, in any way conflicting with the interpretation of s 1 which I have suggested.

h Section 2 (4) appears to me to be primarily, though not exclusively, concerned with a situation in which the employer is reorganising his business or some part of it. It would apply in a case in which an employer was no longer able to continue to employ an employee in the job in which he was previously employed but was able to offer him suitable alternative employment. Under this subsection it is not necessary that the re-employment should take effect immediately on the termination of the prior employment. It must, however, take effect not later than four weeks after that determination. This seems to me to be designed to give the employer a reasonable interval for reorganisation of his business or that part of it which is affected. i It would seem, however, that the subsection would also operate in a case in which the employer offered to re-employ the employee in the same capacity and place as before but on different terms of service or remuneration. To fall within the subsection the offer must be one of suitable employment in relation to the employee. If an offer is made before the termination of the prior employment and is accepted, no question will arise as to suitability or dismissal (s 3 (2)), but if the offer is refused, s 2 (4) will only apply if such refusal is unreasonable. These provisions appear to me to indicate that the Act does not give an employee any vested right to be employed on the same terms and conditions as those obtaining during his prior employment or other terms at least as beneficial as those obtaining during his prior employment, and to negative rather than to support the views expressed by the Divisional Court in the two cases¹ to which I have referred. I cannot discern that s 2 (4) is likely to operate in a way which would be inimical to the interpretation of s 1 which I have suggested.

I accordingly reach the conclusion that the question whether an employee has been dismissed by reason of redundancy must be answered in the light of the relevant surrounding circumstances not on the basis of any hypothesis but on a basis of actuality.

Section 1 (2) (a) cannot apply to the facts of the present case. As regards s 1 (2) (b), the employers' requirement for employees to carry out the work previously carried out by the claimants have neither ceased nor diminished. They have employed seven other men in their place to do that work. Nor were the claimants dismissed because the employers expected their need for employees to do that work to cease or diminish. What has happened is that the employers have succeeded in securing the services of seven employees at the same wage but in respect of whom the employers do not have to incur the cost of providing free transport to their work. The claimants were unwilling to continue in the employment of the employers unless they continued to supply them with free transport. In these circumstances, in my judgment, the claimants are not entitled to be treated as having been dismissed by reason of redundancy. Accordingly in my opinion this appeal fails.

LORD DENNING MR. Orr LJ is unable to be here this morning; but he has read the judgments which have been delivered and agrees with them.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

LORD DENNING MR, MEGAW AND SCARMAN LJJ

b 21st, 22nd MARCH, 3rd APRIL 1973

Arbitration – Special case – Direction by court – Direction to arbitrator to state question of law or award in form of a special case – Discretion of court – Exercise of discretion – Issue involving question of law – When discretion to direct a special case should be exercised – Dispute as to construction of contract terminating time charter – Delay in bringing dispute to arbitration – Arbitration Act 1950, s 21 (1).

c The owners let their vessel to the charterers on a time charter, dated 21st January 1964, for 24 months. The parties agreed to determine the charter as at 30th October 1964, before it had run its full course, leaving a balance of 17 months of the charter undone. The vessel was redelivered to the owners on 29th March 1964. The agreement terminating the charter, which was dated 4th November 1964, provided, by d cl 1, that from the time of redelivery the owners were free to operate and fix the vessel at their discretion, including fixing her on a time charter for any period. By cl 5 of the agreement accounts between the parties were to be adjusted according to whether the owners earned more or less during the balance of the original charter period than they would have done under the original charter. The agreement e stated that any dispute should be settled in London according to English law. For the last eight months of the balance of the original charter period the owners let the vessel on a long term time charter at a low rate which was less than the rate payable under the original charter. The owners claimed to be compensated under cl 5 of the agreement for the difference in the rates. A dispute then arose as to the construction and effect of the agreement insofar as it concerned the basis on which the f vessel's earnings under the subsequent charter were to be measured and the accounts adjusted between the parties. In money terms the amount in dispute between the parties was some £57,000. In 1966 the dispute was referred to arbitration in London, the charterers being the claimants in the arbitration and each side appointed an experienced arbitrator. There was delay in bringing the matter to a hearing and it did not come on for hearing until July 1972. At the arbitration the parties were g represented by counsel and solicitors. The owners requested the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a special case for the decision of the court but by letter dated 19th July 1972 the arbitrators refused on the ground that, if a question of law arose, it was as to the interpretation of the agreement of 4th November 1964 which was a question more suitable for decision by arbitrators since it was closely allied to commercial practice and the interpretation commercial men would give h to the agreement, and involved no principle of law. The owners took out a summons before the commercial judge seeking an order under s 21 (1)^a of the Arbitration Act 1950 directing the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a special case for the court's decision. The judge refused to direct a special case to be stated because he thought the question of law raised was well within the experience and capacity of the arbitrators, and because of the delay in bringing the dispute to arbitration which he considered was attributable to the inaction of the owners. The owners j appealed against the dismissal of the summons.

a Section 21 (1) provides: 'An arbitrator or umpire may, and shall if so directed by the High Court, state—(a) any question of law arising in the course of the reference; or (b) any award or any part of an award, in the form of a special case for the decision of the High Court.'

Held – The court would direct the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a special case for the following reasons—

(i) As a matter of general principle, the discretion (conferred by s 21 (1) of the 1950 Act on an arbitrator or umpire to state an award in the form of a special case, and on the High Court to direct a special case to be stated) should be exercised whenever the proved or admitted facts gave rise to a point of law which was real and substantial, such as to be open to serious argument and appropriate for decision by a court of law; the point should be clear cut and capable of being accurately stated as a point of law, and be a point of law of such importance that its resolution was necessary for the proper determination of the case; when parties agreed to arbitrate it was (by virtue of s 21) on the assumption that a point of law in a proper case could be referred to the courts (see p 1077 c to g, p 1080 a to c and p 1083 b and c, post).

(ii) In the present case, the judge had erred in refusing to direct a special case to be stated because (a) the point of law at issue depended on the true construction of the agreement of 4th November 1964 which was not a point of law specially within the arbitrators' expertise but was one which the court was well qualified to decide, and on which a party was entitled to ask the court itself to rule, and (b) delay on the part of the owners was not a sufficient ground for refusing to direct a special case where, as here, both sides were at fault over delay and the timely conduct of the arbitration was the responsibility of the charterers as claimants (see p 1078 d and e, p 1080 g, p 1081 a g and h and p 1083 h to p 1084 b, post).

Interlocutory appeal

- b The owners, Halfdan Grieg & Co A/S, the respondents in an arbitration reference in which the charterers, Sterling Coal & Navigation Corporation and A C Neleman's Handelen Transportonderneming, were the claimants, took out an originating summons, dated 17th October 1972, seeking an order pursuant to s 21 of the Arbitration Act 1950 that the arbitrators be directed to state in the form of a special case for the decision of the court the following question of law arising in the course of the reference:

- c 'Whether, upon the facts found and upon the true construction of the agreement dated 4th November 1964 the amount that the vessel ['Lysland'] was able to earn in respect of the period between 29th July 1965 and 31st March 1966, falls for the purposes of clause 5 of the said Agreement, to be assessed as:—(a) The sums actually received by the Owners during that period under the time-charter dated 9th June 1965, or (b) the above sums adjusted to take account of the differences between the timecharters dated the 21st January 1964 and the 9th June 1965, in respect of (i) expiry date, and/or (ii) redelivery range, and/or (iii) commissions payable, and/or (iv) quality of fuel to be used.'
- d

- e On 29th November 1972 Kerr J gave a reserved judgment in open court¹ dismissing the summons. The owners appealed seeking an order that the arbitrators be directed to state in the form of a special case the question of law set out in the summons. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

- f 3rd April. The following judgments were read.

- LORD DENNING MR. By a charterparty dated 21st January 1964, the owners of the Norwegian vessel 'Lysland' let her on a time charter for 24 months to charterers. Delivery was effected on 29th March 1964, so that, if the time charter had run its full course, it would have expired about March 1966. But it did not run its full course. The parties agreed to determine it as at 30th October 1964. So it only lasted seven months, leaving the remaining 17 months undone. The owners were thereafter free to operate the vessel at their discretion, but the agreement provided that accounts were to be adjusted according to whether the owners earned more or less during the remaining 17 months than they would have done under the original charter. During the first nine months out of the 17 months, that is, from 30th October 1964, to 29th July 1965, the owners let her on several voyage charters. The figure for those nine months can be adjusted without difficulty. But for the last eight months, from August 1965, to March 1966, the owners let the vessel on a long-term charter at a low rate, which was less than the rate in the original charter. The owners claim to be compensated for the difference. But the charterers say that the owners, if they had tried, could have let the vessel for a shorter term at a rate equivalent to the rate in the original charter, and that, accordingly, the owners are entitled to nothing for that period.
- j

The dispute was referred to arbitration in London. It depended on the true construction of the agreement by which the original charter was determined after seven months. The agreement was dated 4th November 1964. The most material clauses are these: a

'1. [From the time of redelivery] the Owners to operate the vessel at their discretion and Owners are entirely free so fix the ship at their discretion including fixing her on time charter for any period also in excess of the expiry of the time-charter period under C/P dated 21st January 1964 and at rate lower than dollars 3.00 ... b

'4. The deposit [by the charterers to the owners] is to be brought up to the full amount viz. Norw. Kr. 750,000 ...

'5. The amount deposited according to the preceding clause of this agreement is to be returned to the Timecharterers, if, for the balance of the time-charter period as per Charterparty of the 21st January 1964, the Owners are able to earn an amount equivalent to or exceeding dollars 3.00 less 2½% address commission on T/C basis. If the Owners earn less, the difference to be deducted from the amount deposited and the balance of the deposit, if any, to be returned to Timecharterers. If the deposit is not sufficient to cover the said difference the Timecharterers shall immediately pay the said difference so far as it exceeds the amount deposited ... c

'9. Should any dispute arise out of the present agreement, same to be settled in London according to English Law.' d

The contention of the shipowners is that under cl 1 they were entitled to fix the ship for the long-term time charter, and that under cl 5, as it earned less, they were entitled to the difference: whereas, the charterers contend that the sums should be adjusted so as to take account of (a) expiry date; (b) redelivery range; (c) commission payable, and (d) quality of fuel to be used. In money terms, it makes a difference of some £57,000. e

The agreement contained no provision for arbitration. It simply provided that any dispute should be 'settled in London according to English law'. In 1966 the parties did agree to submit the difference to arbitration. We have not seen the arbitration agreement. I assume that it was a simple agreement which would bring in all the provisions of the Arbitration Act 1950 as to the award being final and binding, and so forth. The owners appointed Mr Chesterman as their arbitrator. The charterers appointed Commander Sumpton as theirs. The two arbitrators appointed Mr Barclay as umpire. There was much delay in bringing the matter to a hearing. It did not come on for hearing until 10th and 11th July 1972. At the hearing the parties were represented by counsel and solicitors. The owners requested the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a special case. On 19th July 1972 the arbitrators refused in a letter which I must read in full: f

'With reference to the [owners'] request that we should state our Award in the form of a Special Case we have to advise you that we have decided not to do so for the following reasons:—We do not feel that this is a proper case to be so stated. Whilst it may well be that there is a question of law it is our feeling that, whilst we do not presume to usurp the functions of the Court, it is more suitable for decision by a commercial arbitration tribunal than by the Courts since its interpretation is so closely allied to commercial practice and the interpretation that commercial men would give it. Counsel agreed that the Courts' decision would add nothing to the wealth of law which is already available to us and as there is no further principle of law involved we feel it unnecessary from the point of view of both time and expense to trouble their Lordships further. We have also decided to delay the issue of our Award for fourteen days so that the parties may, if they wish, apply to the Court.' g

On 25th July 1972 the owners took out an originating summons before the commercial judge. They applied for an order under s 21 of the Arbitration Act 1950 that a the arbitrators be directed to state their award in the form of a special case for the decision of the court. They said that a question of law had arisen in the course of the reference as to the assessment of the amount under cl 5 of the agreement.

On 29th November 1972 Kerr J, the commercial judge, gave his decision in open court¹. He declined to order the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a special case. He gave leave to appeal because the case had become a case of principle. So indeed it has been treated before us.

b Counsel for the charterers submitted to the judge several factors which he suggested would be relevant in considering whether or not a case should be stated. Some of them I would accept. Others I would not. I prefer the criteria which junior counsel for the owners put before the judge, and which he accepted. But I would venture to expand them somewhat.

c When one party asks an arbitrator or umpire to state his award in the form of a special case, it is a matter for his discretion. If the issues are on matters of fact and not of law, he should refuse to state a case. If they raise a point of law, it depends on what the point of law is. He should agree to state a case whenever the facts, as proved or admitted before him, give rise to a point of law which fulfils these requisites. The point of law should be real and substantial and such as to be open to serious argument and appropriate for decision by a court of law (see *Re Nuttall and Lynton and Barnstaple Railway Co*²) as distinct from a point which is dependent on the special expertise of the arbitrator or umpire (see *Orion Compagnia Espanola de Seguros v Belfort Maatschappij voor Algemene Verzekering*³). The point of law should be clear cut and capable of being accurately stated as a point of law—as distinct from the dressing up of a matter of fact as if it were a point of law. The point of law should be of such importance that the resolution of it is necessary for the proper determination of the case—as distinct from a side issue of little importance.

e If those three requisites are satisfied, the arbitrator or umpire should state a case. He should not be deterred from doing so by such suggestions as these: it may be suggested that a special case should be reserved for cases which are of general application (such as the construction of a standard form) or which would elucidate or add to the general principles of law (such as the doctrine of frustration or repudiation). I would not so limit the stating of a special case. In most cases the parties themselves are concerned, not with general principles, but with their particular dispute. If the case does involve a point of law which satisfied the requisites which I have mentioned, either of the parties should be enabled to have it decided by a judge of the High Court. When the parties agree to arbitrate, it is, by our law, on the assumption that a point of law can, in a proper case, be referred to the courts.

g It may be suggested that if the point of law is only as to the construction of a particular document or of the words in it—as applied to the proved facts—then it should be left to the arbitrator or umpire. I do not agree. Most of the special cases are stated on points of construction. No one hitherto has thought that they should be refused on that ground.

h It may be suggested that, if the point of law is only as to the proper inference, or the appropriate implication—to be drawn from the proved facts—then it should be left to the arbitrator or umpire. Again, I do not agree. Some of the most important awards have been of that kind: see, for instance, *Re Comptoir Commercial Anversois & Power, Son & Co*⁴.

i It may be suggested that if only a small sum is in dispute, a special case should be refused. Sometimes a small sum can involve big issues of much importance for the parties. In those cases a special case should be stated. But, when the sum is so small as not to justify further time or money being spent on it, it should be refused.

Whilst setting out those guidelines, I would give a word of warning. The arbitrator or umpire should be watchful to see that the procedure by special case is not abused. The conference of Commercial Court Users over which Pearson J presided in 1962¹ drew attention to abuses such as a special case on 'whether upon the facts found by the Umpire his ultimate decision is correct'. That is why I have said that the point of law should be clear cut. Other abuses spring readily to mind. A party may seek to raise a point of law which is too plain for serious argument. Or he may seek to use it as a means of delaying the day when a final award is made against him. In all cases where the arbitrator or umpire is of opinion that the application is not raised bona fide, but for some ulterior motive, he should, of course, refuse it.

In the present case there is no suggestion that the application is not made bona fide or that it is an abuse of the process of a special case. But the judge² has refused to order the arbitrators or umpire to state a special case for two main reasons: (i) that the question of law is one which is well within the experience and capacity of arbitrators; and (ii) a delay of three years between 1969 and 1972 appeared to him² 'to have been due to inaction on the side of the owners'. As to (i), whilst the experience and capacity of the arbitrators and umpire is undoubted, I do not think that the point of law is one which is specially within their expertise. It seems to me that the point at issue depends on the true construction of the agreement which the court is well qualified to decide, and which a party is entitled to ask the court itself to rule on. The court would, of course, give great weight to the views of the arbitrators and umpire on it, but should come to its own decision. As to (ii), I would not myself put anything against the owners on the ground of delay. Neither side is without reproach on this score. The conduct of the arbitration was in the hands of the charterers who were the claimants. It was for them to apply to fix a day for the hearing. In any case, delay in the earlier stages is no reason for a departure from proper practice at the later stages—unless it goes to show want of bona fides, which is not suggested here.

Counsel for the charterers referred to the words of Lord Wilberforce in *Compagnie d'Armement Maritime SA v Compagnie Tunisienne de Navigation SA*³ and suggested that when the decision of the arbitrators was followed by the decision of the commercial judge—refusing a special case—that should end the matter. In the ordinary way I would agree. But this case was treated by the judge as raising a question of principle. So it has been in this court. His decision would, I think, alter the practice hitherto adopted. The judge said that he did not wish to do this. He emphasised⁴ that his decision 'should not be taken as any indication . . . that special cases should be stated less frequently in the future than in the past'. But I think that it would inevitably tend to do so. This is a typical case where the court in the past would order a special case. If the residual discretion (to which the judge referred) is to be applied in this case, it would fall to be applied in many others like it. I would keep to the existing practice and order the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a special case. I would allow the appeal, accordingly.

MEGAW LJ. Section 21 (1) (b) of the Arbitration Act 1950 gives to the High Court a discretion whether or not to direct that an arbitrator or umpire shall state an award in the form of a special case.

In the earlier part of his judgment, Kerr J⁴ has sought to deal with a question of general principle. I use the words 'general principle' because the learned judge himself used them. The general principle is the definition of factors which (I quote the words in the judgment⁵)—

1 Commercial Court Users' Conference Report 1962, Cmnd 1616

- a 'would be relevant in considering how the exercise of the discretion should be approached insofar as they may be applicable in any particular case, but without any single one being by itself likely to be decisive'.

What the learned judge had in mind was the very desirable object of helping to achieve greater uniformity in decisions by the courts, and perhaps also by arbitrators, where a request for a special case is made by one party and is opposed by the other party; and also helping the parties and their advisers to predict the probable result of such an application, if it were to be made to the High Court.

- b With very great respect to the learned judge, I do not think that his statement of relevant factors would, on balance, assist in achieving those results. On the contrary, I believe that the acceptance of his general principle (the suggested relevant factors) would have the opposite effect. Where there was, or was intended to be, c an application for a case to be stated, which was, or was likely to be, opposed, the parties or their advisers would be likely to scrutinise the list of approved relevant factors and to try to find matters, falling within the respective heads, for which, in the absence of such a list, it would perhaps not have occurred to them to claim materiality or relevance. With regard to some of the factors, this would be particularly unfortunate. For example, factor (a)¹, at least unless it were given further d qualification, might well result in invidious and undesirable evidence being proffered as to the particular qualifications or experience of an individual arbitrator. Factor (g)¹ might result in evidence and counter-evidence being adduced of things alleged to have been said or done in the course of the arbitration, from which the court might be asked to draw an inference one way or the other as to what the arbitrator was minded to decide. Still worse, the court might be asked to investigate e an alleged¹ 'tendency in some way to behave unjudicially', when such an allegation, if it is properly to be made at all, ought to be made in some wholly different proceedings under the Arbitration Act 1950. Again factor (c)¹—the acceptance in principle of the presence or absence of citation of authorities as a relevant factor—might well, without any impropriety, create a tendency towards such citation where none is really required, or an overcautious, excessive citation of textbooks and cases in order f to try to establish the more firmly that the point of law is a lawyers' point. None of these tendencies, if they were to arise, would help the parties, or the arbitrators or the court.

- Further, I suspect, the suggested 'relevant factors', elevated to the status of judicially recognised principle in respect of the exercise of the discretion, would themselves be but the starting point for further judicial exposition and qualification, all coming g in as additional rules or sub-rules by way of accepted jurisprudence affecting the exercise of the discretion.

- Moreover, this gallant, and very understandable, attempt to assist in providing greater uniformity and certainty, is, in my judgment, not only likely to produce the opposite effect. It is also, I believe, unnecessary because of another, and as I think correct, simple general principle affecting the exercise of the discretion which the h learned judge himself stresses. At the end of his discussion of the 'relevant factors', and immediately before he passes on, 'having dealt with the general principle', to consider the exercise of the discretion in the present case, the learned judge says²:

- i '... I think that borderline cases should be decided in favour of stating or directing special cases, because in cases of doubt parties should not be shut out from arguing a question of law in the courts.'

The learned judge, as I understand him, re-emphasises the same general principle in a passage towards the end of his judgment, in which he says³:

1 See [1973] 1 All ER at 551, [1973] 2 WLR at 244

'It is however necessary to emphasise that my decision not to direct the statement of a special case on this application should not be taken as any indication . . . that special cases should be stated less frequently in the future than in the past. If one takes the criteria put forward by counsel for the owners, that is to say, a clear-cut question of law which is seriously arguable, substantial in the sense of being important for the resolution of the dispute and to the parties, and which is raised bona fide and not merely for the purposes of delay, then I would expect that in the great majority of cases in which these criteria are satisfied, special cases will in future, as in the past, be stated on request or, if necessary, directed by the courts.'

That, in my judgment, is a correct, and sufficient, statement of the general principle of the exercise of the discretion in a case such as this. Of course, there may always be special factors in a particular case: they may include some, at least, of the factors to which the learned judge referred in his statement of general principle. But they are not a part of any general principle which can usefully be stated.

I now turn to the issue which arises directly in this case and the question of the exercise of the discretion in this particular case. As I understand the judgment, the learned judge was content to accept the criteria referred to in the passage of his judgment which I have most recently quoted. He says¹:

'... although these criteria are admittedly satisfied here, I consider that in the particular circumstances of this case the court's discretion should not be exercised.'

It is, therefore, necessary, not as a matter of general principle, but in relation to the circumstances of this case, to consider whether the reasons given by the learned judge, since he did, very properly, state his reasons, justify the exercise of the discretion against the stating of a special case. Two reasons were given. I shall take the second of them first¹:

'On the evidence before me, a delay of nearly three years between 1969 and 1972 appears to have been due to inaction on the side of the owners, who have been in possession of a substantial deposit for more than seven years since this was claimed back by the charterers. The owners' request for a special case at this stage would therefore inevitably still further delay the resolution of this long-standing dispute.'

The only evidence before the judge was affidavit evidence. On that evidence, I fear that I am unable to accept that the fault lay, either exclusively or principally, with the owners. The charterers were the claimants. The timely conduct of the arbitration was, at least primarily, theirs. They could at any time have taken effective steps to bring it to hearing. The fact, as asserted in the affidavit for the charterers, that the owners failed, for an unspecified period, to tell the charterers which of the charterers' documents they wished to have copied is—I say it with all respect—not a sufficient basis for putting the whole or main responsibility for the delay in the hearing on the owners. Indeed, the very fact that such a complaint is put in the forefront of the charterers' evidence before the judge might be an indication of the poverty of the available material. It is true that before us, when counsel for the owners poured gentle scorn on this aspect of the charterers' case, we were told by counsel for the charterers that there was more in this than appeared in the affidavit. We, rightly, I think, refused to hear further evidence on that matter at this stage. When the charterers are asserting that delay on the part of the owners is a relevant factor, it would be inappropriate to allow them to rely on further evidence which they should, if it were material, have produced months ago. It would be wrong that they

a should succeed now, if the fresh evidence were indeed material, on a ground of delay by the owners, when that delay is sought to be proved by evidence produced for the first time in this court. If I am right in this, then that fact alone—the reliance by the judge on an unsound reason in exercising his discretion—justifies this court, apart from any other considerations, in reviewing the exercise of the discretion.

b The other reason, the first reason, given by the learned judge for exercising his discretion to refuse to direct a case to be stated was, if I have understood it correctly, that, though the question was a question of construction, and therefore technically a question of law¹, 'The sole issue is the proper comparison of the earnings of a vessel under two time charters'. With great respect, that is not the issue. I think that the learned judge has fallen into error. The question was whether on the construction of this agreement, the owners being under cl 1 contractually free to operate and fix the vessel at their discretion and cl 5 including the phrase 'if . . . the Owners are able to earn' and 'if the Owners earn', what was relevant was, on the one hand, actual earnings, or, on the other hand, earnings on the basis of charterparties comparable in various respects to the abandoned charterparty. There was, it appears, much evidence, and argument, at the hearing of the arbitration as to the feasibility of a comparable charterparty and as to the earnings which it would produce. Obviously c if the charterers were right on the question of construction, part at least of that evidence would be vitally relevant to the amount of any award. It had to be carefully tested and explored for that, if for no other reason. It is possible (it is not for me to express a view) that the question whether the parties, at the time when they entered into the agreement, would or would not have contemplated as commercial men that such a comparable charterparty would or would not have been likely to be available at the time when the agreement was to be performed, might be of relevance e to the question of construction. It is possible (again it would be wrong for me to express any view) that the correspondence leading up to the making of the agreement, on which it appears much time was spent at the hearing, might have a bearing on the meaning to be given to the agreement. But I think that the very fact that in the affidavit on behalf of the charterers it is said: 'The correspondence was investigated in order to advance submissions concerning the aims of the parties in entering f into the Agreement' is itself an indication that the review by the court of a decision on the construction of the agreement might be appropriate.

I see nothing in these questions which leads to the conclusion that this is the sort of case in which the special knowledge and experience of the arbitrators as to the chartering market makes it undesirable that the question of construction should be considered by the court. I think that the indications, from what we have been g told in the affidavits, are the other way.

Accordingly, with great respect to the learned judge, I do not think that either of the considerations on which he based his decision to refuse a special case justify his opinion that there are particular circumstances in this case which warrant the exercise of his discretion in that way. In my judgment the discretion should have been exercised to direct that the award be stated in the form of a special case. I reach this h conclusion because of my disagreement as to the particular factors of the particular case on which the judge based his exercise of discretion.

There are two further matters which I would mention. First, I agree with the learned judge's criticism² of the letter in which the arbitrators announced their decision to refuse a special case. The other matter which I should mention is that j counsel for the charterers sought support from a paragraph in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in *Compagnie d'Armement Maritime SA v Compagnie Tunisienne de Navigation SA*³. With very great respect, I do not think that what is said in that paragraph assists in the decision of the present case, helpful though it undoubtedly is in other types of case. In *Compagnie d'Armement*¹ no one had resisted the request for the statement of an interim award in the form of a special case under s 21 (1) (b) of the Arbitration Act 1950. Indeed, unless my recollection is at fault, the indication was that both parties desired that there should be a decision of the High Court. So far as concerns appeals thereafter, with great respect I have difficulty in following the suggestion in the last sentence of the paragraph² to the effect that leave to appeal from the commercial judge should be given only in exceptional cases. For by s 21 (3) of the 1950 Act, Parliament has provided that leave is not required for an appeal to this court, where an award, whether final or interim, has been stated in the form of a special case under s 21 (1) (b) and has been decided by the High Court. Moreover, the judge who decided the Compagnie d'Armement case¹ in the High Court³, as I happen to know, regarded himself, properly I think, as bound to follow the reasoning of the judgments in an earlier case, *Tzortzis v Monark Line A/B*⁴. It follows, I think, that had it not been for the statement of the special case in *Compagnie d'Armement*³ and its subsequent curriculum of appeals, to this court⁵ as of right and to the House of Lords¹ by leave of their Lordships, it is fair to assume that the *Tzortzis*⁴ reasoning would have remained to this day as authoritative in English commercial and private international law, instead of, as in fact happened, ceasing to be of authority as a result of disapproval by the House of Lords in *Compagnie d'Armement*¹. Further, unless there is some special magic in frustration cases, the decision of the House of Lords in *Tsakiroglou & Co Ltd v Noble & Thorl GmbH*⁶, appears, at least by implication, to indicate that there is nothing out of place in the courts exercising supervision by the special case procedure, even though commercial considerations are of paramount importance in the particular case in deciding what is, at least technically, a question of law, and even though, as had happened in *Tsakiroglou*⁶, experienced commercial arbitrators had expressed clear and strong findings as to the relevant commercial considerations.

I would allow the appeal.

SCARMAN LJ. This appeal is concerned with a dispute between American charterers and the Norwegian owners of the 'Lysland' as to the true effect of the financial terms of a contract by which they agreed to the premature termination of a time charter. The contract provided for disputes 'to be settled in London according to English law'. After the dispute had arisen, the parties referred it to arbitration. The owners applied to the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a special case: but the arbitrators refused, saying:

'Whilst it may well be that there is a question of law . . . it is more suitable for decision by a commercial arbitration tribunal than by the Courts since its interpretation is so closely allied to commercial practice and the interpretation that commercial men would give it.'

The commercial judge has upheld their refusal⁷.

It is not very often that, when faced with a question of law, arbitrators refuse to accede to an application that they state their award in the form of a special case. But when they do, and the commercial judge supports them, this court should not, I a think, interfere unless it can be shown that such refusal is either wrong in principle or based on a misunderstanding of the matters in issue.

The discretion conferred by s 21 (1) of the Arbitration Act 1950 on an arbitrator or umpire to state an award in the form of a special case and on the High Court to direct one is unqualified. The statute imposes no restrictions, formulates no guidelines: but it does declare the purpose of such an award—to obtain on the case stated the decision of the court. By declaring this purpose the statute makes plain that our law offers to those who refer their disputes to arbitration the opportunity of seeking a decision of the court on a point of law, the decision of which is necessary to the proper determination of their dispute. One can, therefore, conclude, not by way of judicial gloss, but by inference deriving directly from the language of the section, that the power to state a case or to direct that a case be stated should not be exercised unless there has arisen a point of law real, substantial, relevant and such as ought to be decided by the High Court.

c So far as one can judge from the books, the practice since 1889 has adhered faithfully to this purpose, which was to be found equally clearly stated in the Arbitration Acts of 1889 and 1934. The courts have had regard to the nature of the point of law raised and, if satisfied that it was genuine and had to be decided, would direct a case to be stated: see *Re Nuttall and Lynton and Barnstaple Railway Co*¹. Sometimes, in the exercise of their discretion, they have refused, as in *Re Gray, Laurier & Co and Boustead & Co*². But generally their approach appears to have been that, once satisfied that a point of law needed to be decided, they would not refuse unless there were special circumstances: for instance, in commercial disputes most points of law are questions of construction of an agreement. Judges are not necessarily or always the best qualified to decide such questions which may turn on the trade or customary meaning of terms used in a particular branch of commerce. In such a case the court may take the view that decision of the point of law is best left to the arbitrator: see *Orion Compagnia Espanola de Seguros v Belfort Maatschappij voor Algemene Verzekering*³.

e Although, as Lord Denning MR and Megaw LJ have shown, the judgment under appeal can be criticised in a number of respects where it is attempting to offer guidance as to the exercise of the discretion, the judge, in my opinion, correctly identified the issues he had to decide in this case. He attached importance to two factors—the nature of the point of law raised and delay in the conduct of the arbitration. He was clearly right to do so: the point of law is the heart of the matter, while delay is always relevant to the exercise of discretion. But, unfortunately, he reached a demonstrably wrong conclusion on each.

g First, the point of construction. He thought it⁴ 'well within the experience and capacity' of the arbitrators, though he did not go so far as to agree with them that it was, to quote their letter 'more suitable for decision by a commercial arbitration tribunal than by the Courts'. In fact, there is nothing specialist or esoteric in the clauses of the contract that have to be construed. Their language is perfectly ordinary English. Though, no doubt, they must be construed against the background and in the circumstances of a particular trade, they are not such as would cause a court (assisted, as it would be, by the case stated by the arbitrators) any unusual difficulty calling for the exercise of other than ordinary legal skill or judicial experience. Accordingly, I think the judge erred in regarding this point of law as better left to the arbitrators. In my opinion, it is suitable for decision by the court, and, because of its importance to the parties in this arbitration, should be so decided.

Secondly, the factor of delay. The judge¹ thought that the delay was 'due to inaction on the side of the owners' and that to direct a special case would cause further delay in the resolution of this long-standing dispute. But the charterers, as claimants in the arbitration, could at any time have applied to fix a date for the arbitration, but did not. They cannot now be heard to complain of past delay. As for the future, if a special case is stated, the parties face no more than the delays necessarily incidental to the legal process. Accordingly, I think the judge erred also in regarding delay in this case as a ground for refusing to direct that a case be stated.

For these reasons I think an award stated in the form of a special case should be directed. I would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed. Order made in the terms asked in the originating summons. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

LORD DENNING MR, STAMP AND JAMES LJ
6th, 27th MARCH 1973

Indemnity – Subrogation – Contract of indemnity – Right of indemnifier to be subrogated to rights of indemnified – Nature of right – Right as an incident to all contracts of indemnity – Exclusion of right – Implied exclusion – Circumstances in which right will be excluded – Contract between firm of cleaners and factory owner to clean factory – Contract containing indemnity by cleaners to indemnify owner against loss or damage caused by negligence of factory owner's servants – Cleaners' servant injured at factory by negligence of factory owner's servant – Indemnity sought by factory owner against cleaners for liability to cleaners' servant – Cleaners seeking to be subrogated to owner's right of action against his own negligent servant.

By a contract made in 1969 between the defendants and the third party, a firm of cleaners, the third party agreed to perform cleaning services at the defendants' factory. The contract contained a number of general clauses dealing with the provision of the cleaning services. It also contained an indemnity clause by which the third party undertook to indemnify the defendants against all losses and claims in respect of injuries or damage to any person arising out of or in connection with the performance of the cleaning services, whether occasioned by the negligence of the defendants, the third party or their respective servants or agents. Underneath the indemnity clause, there was a note in large black type advising the third party to extend its employer's liability insurance to include liability under the indemnity clause. The plaintiff, a servant of the third party, while employed in cleaning the defendants' factory was injured as a result of the negligence of one of the defendants' servants employed at a the factory. The plaintiff sued the defendants for damages for injuries caused by their servant's negligence and the claim was settled for £686.95 damages and costs. Relying on the indemnity clause in the contract between themselves and the third party the defendants brought the third party into the action claiming against it an indemnity in respect of the defendants' liability to the plaintiff. The third party then brought into the action the defendants' negligent servant, the fourth party, claiming b indemnity from him in respect of the third party's liability to the defendants. The basis of the claim against the fourth party was that the third party was entitled, on indemnifying the defendants, to be subrogated to the defendants' right to recover against their negligent servant the damages and costs for which they were liable. As a matter of principle the defendants would never have sought to enforce their right against the fourth party for they knew that to do so would court industrial action in the form of strikes. Like other employers the defendants were insured against c liability for their servants' negligence; the insurers would likewise never have sought to institute a claim against a negligent employee of the defendants, in respect of injury to a fellow employee, because by a 'gentleman's agreement' made in 1959 members of the British Insurers Association (to which the defendants' insurers belonged) had agreed not to institute such claims. The third party did not know of the gentleman's agreement or that the defendants had never sued their own negligent servants. At d the trial the judge upheld the third party's claim and the fourth party appealed.

Held – (i) Where a person entered into a contract to indemnify another, whether by a contract of insurance or by any other contract of indemnity, and he paid the amount of the loss or damages to the person indemnified, he was entitled to the advantages of every right of action of the person indemnified, whether in contract or tort, which e might go in diminution of the loss, but he had to sue in the name of the person indemnified. That right of subrogation arose from the nature of the contract of indemnity itself, as a necessary incident of that contract, and did not arise as a matter of implied contract. Accordingly, the third party was entitled under the contract with the defendants, which was a contract of indemnity, to be subrogated to the defendants' f right of action against their servant, the fourth party, unless it could be shown that the contract of indemnity by implication excluded the right of subrogation, or (per Lord Denning MR), the right of subrogation being an equitable right, unless it could be shown that it was not just or equitable to compel the defendants to lend their name to an action by the third party against their servant (see p 1089 j to p 1090 b and e, p 1093 b to e, p 1094 h, p 1095 f and p 1100 b c and f, post); dicta of Lord Cairns LC in Simpson v Thomson (1877) 3 App Cas at 284, of Lord Blackburn in Burnand v Rodocanachi (1882) 7 App Cas at 339 and of Cotton and Bowen LJ in Castellain v Preston (1883) 11 QBD at 393, 403, 404 applied; dictum of Lord Eldon LC in Craythorne v Swinburne (1807) 14 Ves at 164 explained.

(ii) (Stamp LJ dissenting) In the circumstances the third party was not entitled to be subrogated to the defendants' right of action and the appeal would be allowed because a) (per Lord Denning MR) it was not just and equitable to compel the defendants to h lend their name to an action against their own servant; such an action would lead to a strike; it would be unjust to make the fourth party personally liable since the defendants were insured against the risk of his negligence and the third party had been advised in the contract of indemnity to insure against its liability under the indemnity (see p 1090 h to p 1091 b and f, post); (b) (per James LJ) the contract of indemnity was operative in an industrial setting in which subrogation of the third j party to the rights and remedies of the defendants against their servants was unacceptable and unrealistic; accordingly there should be implied in the contract a term whereby the right of subrogation was excluded (see p 1102 f and g, post).

Appeal

The plaintiff, Eric Morris, a servant of the third party, Cameron Industrial Services Ltd, cleaners who had contracted to clean a factory owned by the defendants, Ford Motor Co Ltd, was injured in the course of his employment at the factory by the negligence of the defendants' servant, the fourth party, Frederick Roberts. The plaintiff's claim against the defendants for damages for injuries caused by their servant's negligence was settled for £686.95 damages and taxed costs of £305.69. By a third party notice the defendants claimed to be indemnified by the third party in respect i a of the plaintiff's claim under the contract between the defendants and the third party to clean the defendants' factory. The third party conceded liability to indemnify the defendants but by a fourth party notice claimed against the fourth party indemnity in respect of the defendants' claim against the third party. On the trial of the fourth party proceedings, Hollings J, on 21st April 1972, adjudged that on payment by the third party to the defendants of the agreed damages and costs in settlement of b the plaintiff's claim against the defendants the third party was entitled to a declaration that it should be subrogated to the defendants' right of action against their servant, the fourth party, to recover against him complete indemnity in respect of the plaintiff's claim. The fourth party appealed from that judgment. The grounds of the appeal were that the judge was wrong in law in holding: (1) that the third party was entitled to be subrogated to the defendants' rights; (2) that the contract

c between the defendants and the third party was a contract of indemnity; (3) that subrogation was a right conferred by law where there was a duty to indemnify; (4) that the contract, or relevant part of it, was a contract of insurance, and that the right of subrogation should be extended to include the contract as analogous to a contract of insurance; and (5) that the judge ought to have held as a matter of law that subrogation arose out of a term implied in certain contracts of which the present
d contract was not one. The facts and the material terms of the contract between the defendants and the third party are set out in the judgments of Lord Denning MR and James LJ.

Michael Ogden QC and S C Desch for the fourth party.

R L Ward QC and J H Roberts for the third party.

The plaintiff and the defendants did not appear and were not represented.

LORD DENNING MR. On 26th January 1969 Mr Eric Morris was working at f the huge motor factory owned by the Ford Motor Co at Halewood in Lancashire. He was not employed by Fords but by a firm of cleaners, Cameron Industrial Services Ltd, who had contracted to clean the factory. Whilst at his work, Morris was injured. It was all due to the negligence of one of Fords' servants. This servant was one Mr Frederick Roberts. He drove a fork-lift truck without keeping a proper look-out. In consequence Morris's leg was jammed against a wall. Morris was not very g seriously injured. His damages were only £686.95. But his claim has given rise to an interesting point. It arises in this way.

Morris issued a writ against Fords claiming damages for injuries caused by the negligence of Fords' servant. Fords then served a third party notice against the firm of cleaners claiming an indemnity. Fords said that, under the cleaning contract, h the firm of cleaners had contracted to indemnify Fords against any liability to Morris, even though it was caused by the negligence of Fords' own servants. The firm of cleaners then issued a fourth party notice against Roberts personally. He was the servant of Fords who was driving the fork-lift truck.

Now this firm of cleaners had obviously no claim on their own account against Roberts. Roberts by his negligence had done no damage to the property or person of the cleaners themselves. He had only done damage to their servant Morris. Roberts was, therefore, liable to Morris. So also were Fords liable to Morris because i they were the employers of Roberts. Roberts and Fords were joint tortfeasors. Morris could, if he had wished, have sued them together and got judgment against both of them. As it was, he sued Fords only. He got damages against them. Thereupon Fords could themselves have sued their own servant Roberts on the ground that Roberts owed Fords a duty to drive the truck carefully: and that his negligence had involved Fords in liability to Morris. If Fords had sued Roberts, they would no doubt have got judgment against him for the full amount which they had had to pay to Morris. That is clear from the decision of the House of Lords in *Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd*¹. But, in point of fact, Fords would never, for a moment, have dreamt of suing their own servant Roberts. If they did so, all the men would have come out on strike. The men would say, with great force: 'This sum should be paid by the insurance company, and not by Roberts himself.' To make him pay personally for an accident at the works would be most unfair. But, although Fords would not themselves sue their own servant, Roberts, the firm of cleaners seek to sue him. The cleaners cannot, of course, sue Roberts in their own name. But they assert that they are entitled to use Fords' name to sue Roberts. Using the lawyer's words, the cleaners say that they are entitled 'to be subrogated' to the rights of Fords against Roberts. Using the layman's words, the cleaners say that they are entitled to 'stand in the shoes of Fords' and to exercise against Roberts all the rights which Fords have against him.

If the cleaners are right in this contention—if they can thus force Roberts to pay the damages personally—it would imperil good industrial relations. When a man such as Roberts makes a mistake—like not keeping a good look-out—and someone is injured, no one expects the man himself to have to pay the damages personally. It is rather like the driver of a car on the road. The damages are expected to be borne by the insurers. The courts themselves recognise this every day. They would not find negligence so readily—or award sums of such increasing magnitude—except on the footing that the damages are to be borne, not by the man himself, but by an insurance company. If the man himself is made to pay, he will feel much aggrieved. He will say to his employers: 'Surely this liability is covered by insurance?' He is employed to do his master's work, to drive his master's trucks, and to cope with situations presented to him by his master. The risks attendant on that work—including liability for negligence—should be borne by the master. The master takes the benefit and should bear the burden. The wages are fixed on that basis. If the servant is to bear the risk, his wages ought to be increased to cover it.

It was such considerations as these which prompted the Minister of Labour and National Service in 1957 to appoint an inter-departmental committee to study the implications of *Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd*¹. The committee made its report in 1959. It did not recommend legislation to reverse that decision because it felt that insurers would not abuse it. It said:

'The decision in the *Lister case*¹ shows that employers and their insurers have rights against employees which, if exploited unreasonably, would endanger good industrial relations. We think that employers and insurers, if only in their own interests, will not so exploit their rights . . .'

In consequence of that report, the members of the British Insurance Association adhered to this 'gentleman's agreement':

'Employers' Liability Insurers agree that they will not institute a claim against the employee of an insured employer in respect of death of or injury to a fellow-employee, unless the weight of evidence clearly indicates (1) collusion or (2) wilful misconduct, on the part of the employee against whom the claim is made.'

According to that agreement, if Roberts, the driver of the fork-lift truck, had injured one of Fords' own employees, the injured employee would have his remedy against Fords, who would be indemnified by Fords' insurers, but those insurers would not seek to recover the amount from Roberts, the driver.

a injured man, Morris, was not an employee of Fords but was an employee of the firm of cleaners. So the cleaners claim to make Roberts, Fords' driver, personally liable. Fords object to this. In their view it would produce serious industrial repercussions. But, despite Fords' objection, the cleaners are determined to press their claim to be subrogated to the rights of Fords. The claim is based on the contract of indemnity, to which I will now turn.

b The contract of indemnity

Fords employed the firm of cleaners to clean the factory under a contract which contained a number of general clauses. These were applicable to an order given by the purchaser (Fords) to the contractor (the cleaners). These dealt with: (1) working hours; (2) payment for day work and overtime; (3) increased costs; (4) responsibility for materials etc on the site; (5) labour and plant. Then cl 6 dealt with c 'insurance and third party risks'. The material sub-clause of cl 6 is (b), which says:

d 'The Contractor [the cleaners] shall indemnify the Purchaser [Fords] against all losses and claims of whatsoever nature for or in respect of injuries or damage to any person or property howsoever caused arising out of or in connection with the performance of the Order [for cleaning to be done] and also against all claims, demands, proceedings, damages, costs, charges and expenses whatsoever in respect thereof or in relation thereto, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing the Contractor [the cleaners] shall be liable to indemnify the Purchaser [Fords] under this clause whether the loss or claim is occasioned by or arises from the negligence or breach of statutory duty of the Purchaser [Fords], the Contractor [the cleaners] or any sub-Contractor or their respective e servants or agents.'

It is conceded that under that clause the cleaners are bound to indemnify Fords against their liability to Morris.

Then there is a note in bigger blacker type directed to the contractor (the cleaners):

f 'N.B. YOU ARE ADVISED TO ARRANGE IF NECESSARY FOR THE EXTENSION OF YOUR EMPLOYERS LIABILITY AND THIRD PARTY POLICIES TO INCLUDE YOUR CONTRACTUAL LIABILITY HAVING REGARDS PARTICULARLY TO CLAUSE 6 (a) AND (b).'

The doctrine of subrogation

This is a contract which contains an indemnity. As such, it gives rise to a right in the indemnifier to be subrogated to the rights of the indemnified. But it is necessary

g to analyse this right. In particular, to see whether it gives the indemnifier a right to sue in the name of the indemnified.

Let me first distinguish it from a contract of suretyship. When a surety pays off the debt, he is entitled in his own name to sue the principal debtor for the amount, or to sue his co-sureties for contribution. He is entitled to any securities which may have been given for the debt by the principal debtor to the creditor. These

h rights do not depend on contract, but on the established principles of the courts of equity. It was so stated by Sir Samuel Romilly in his argument in *Craythorne v Swinburne*¹, which was approved by Lord Eldon LC². Also by Lord Selborne LC and Lord Blackburn in *Duncan, Fox & Co v North and South Wales Bank*³.

Now I turn to contracts of indemnity. Where an insurer—or any other person who enters into a contract to indemnify another—pays the amount of the loss or

j damages to the insured, he is entitled to the advantages of every right of action of the assured, whether in contract or in tort, which may go in diminution of the loss:

3 (1880) 6 App Cas 1 at 12, 18, 19

see *Castellain v Preston*¹ and *H Cousins & Co Ltd v D & C Carriers Ltd*². This entitlement, too, does not depend on the contract itself but on the 'plainest equity'. At any rate, Lord Hardwicke LC said so: see *Randal v Cockran*³ as explained in *Yates v Whyte*⁴. But this entitlement does not amount to an assignment of the right of action. It does not entitle the insurer or the indemnifier to sue in his own name a wrongdoer who has caused the loss or damage: see *London Assurance Co v Sainsbury*⁵; *Simpson v Thomson*⁶. In order to sue the wrongdoer, the insurer or indemnifier must use the name of the insured party indemnified: see *Mason v Sainsbury*⁷. But the important point to notice is this. The insurer has no right at law to make use of the name of the assured. If the assured did not consent to it, the insurer had to go to a court of equity to compel him to allow it. And the court of equity could impose such terms as it thought fit. Take this case: suppose an insurer, without the consent of the assured, brings an action in the name of the assured against the wrongdoer. The action fails, and costs are awarded against the assured. The insurer does not pay the costs. He may be insolvent and not have the money to pay the costs. In that case the assured would have to pay the costs himself. That cannot be right. So it was always held that, if an insured did not consent to his name being used, the insurer had to go to a court of equity to compel him to allow his name to be used: see *Yorkshire Insurance Co Ltd v Nisbet Shipping Co Ltd*⁸ per Diplock J. A court of equity would only compel it on such terms as were just and equitable. It might, for instance, insist on the insurer giving security for the costs: see *John Edwards & Co v Motor Union Insurance Co*⁹. Strangely enough, no case has been found in the reports in which a court of equity has been asked to compel a man to give his name to be used in action of tort. At any rate, Mr Arthur Cohen QC, one of the best lawyers of the last century, did not find one: see *King v Victoria Insurance Co*¹⁰. So I do not suppose I could. But, the very fact that the insurer had to go to a court of equity shows that the right of the insurer to sue in the name of the assured arises in equity and not by virtue of an implied contract.

I should say, for sake of completeness, that if the insured assigns his right of action to the insurers and notice of the assignment is given to the wrongdoer, the insurer can now sue in his own name: see *Compania Colombiana de Seguros v Pacific Steam Navigation Co*¹¹. But, otherwise, unless the assured consents, the insurer has to resort to equity.

What is the equity in this case?

In my opinion, therefore, this case is to be tested according to the principles of equity. Before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, the question would be: would a court of equity compel Fords to allow their name to be used to sue their servant, Roberts? Since the Judicature Act, the question is: is it just and equitable that Fords should be compelled to sue, or to lend their name to sue, their own servant, Roberts, for damages, so as to make him personally liable? My answer to that is emphatic. It is not just and equitable. In the contract with the cleaners, Fords advised the cleaners to arrange with their insurance company to cover their liability under the indemnity. I expect they did so. Their insurance company has received a the premiums and should bear the loss. It should not seek to make Roberts personally liable. Everyone knows that risks such as these are covered by insurance. So they should be, when a man is doing his employer's work, with his employer's plant and equipment, and happens to make a mistake. To make the servant personally liable would not only lead to a strike. It would be positively unjust. *Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd*¹ was an unfortunate decision. Its ill effects have been avoided only by an agreement between insurers not to enforce it. It should not be extended to this case. I would apply this simple principle: where the risk of a servant's negligence is covered by insurance, his employer should not seek to make that servant liable for it. At any rate, the courts should not compel him to allow his name to be used to do it.

c Implied contract

If I am wrong in putting the right of subrogation on principles of equity, then it must be put on implied contract. Diplock J so put it in *Yorkshire Insurance Co Ltd v Nisbet Shipping Co Ltd*² when he said:

d 'The expression "subrogation" in relation to a contract of marine insurance is thus no more than a convenient way of referring to those terms which are to be implied in the contract between the assured and the insurer to give business efficacy ...'

e Tested in this way, the question would be: in the contract between Fords and the cleaners, was there an implied term that, if the cleaners paid under the indemnity, they should be entitled to use Fords' name so as to sue Fords' servant? The answer is clearly No. If the circumstances had been put to any of those concerned they would have said: 'The risk must be covered by insurance effected by the cleaners. The insurance company must pay the amount. They cannot come down on the servant personally.'

Conclusion

f In my opinion the doctrine of subrogation cannot be used here so as to entitle the cleaners or their insurers to sue Roberts and make him personally liable. No matter whether it arises in equity or in contract, the doctrine cannot be carried so far. I would, therefore, allow the appeal and dismiss the claim for subrogation.

g STAMP LJ. The plaintiff, Mr Eric Morris, was employed as a cleaner by Cameron Industrial Services Ltd ('Camerons'). While cleaning the factory of the defendants, Ford Motor Co Ltd ('Fords') at Halewood, Lancashire, the plaintiff was injured as the result of the negligent act of the fourth party who was one of Fords' employees. The plaintiff sued Fords and the claim was settled for £686.95 and £305.69 costs. h Fords could recover against their employee, the fourth party, the amount of the damage which they were bound to pay (see *Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd*¹) but would not seek to do so and nor would their insurers. Nevertheless the right is there.

There was an agreement between Fords and Camerons under which the latter contracted to clean the factory. Clause 6 of that agreement provided, inter alia, as follows:

j '(b) The Contractor [i.e. Camerons] shall indemnify the Purchaser [i.e. Fords] against all losses and claims of whatsoever nature for or in respect of injuries or damage to any person or property howsoever caused arising out of or in connection with the performance of the Order and also against all claims, demands, proceedings, damages, costs, charges and expenses whatsoever in respect thereof or in relation thereto, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing the Contractor shall be liable to indemnify the Purchaser under this clause whether the loss or claim is occasioned by or arises from the negligence or breach of statutory duty of the Purchaser, the Contractor or any sub-Contractor or their respective servants or agents. a

'(c) The Contractor shall insure and keep insured during the continuance of the order in the joint names of the Purchaser and the Contractor all liabilities which may attach to them or either of them for any injury, loss or damage to any person or property arising out of or in connection with the performance of the order. This sub paragraph is in addition to and not in derogation of sub paragraph (b) of this clause. Provided nevertheless that (a) (b) and (c) above shall not apply when the enquiry or order is subject to the I.M.E. and I.E.E. General Conditions of Contract or to the General Conditions of Contract issued by the Institute of Civil Engineers.' b

Relying on these provisions Fords brought in Camerons as third parties to the action brought against them by the plaintiff claiming an indemnity in respect of the plaintiff's claim for damages and costs. The third party (Camerons) then brought in as the fourth party the employee of Fords whose negligence it was alleged caused the damage: the basis of this claim being that the third party by the effect of the doctrine of subrogation was entitled on indemnifying Fords to have the benefit of Fords' rights against the fourth party, their employee. d

No point being taken on the fact that the third party has not yet discharged its liability to Fords the question for determination is whether on discharging its liability to Fords Camerons will, by the effect of the doctrine of subrogation, be entitled to Fords' rights against the fourth party. e

Counsel for the fourth party submitted that the right of subrogation exists only in five classes of case—insurance cases, suretyship, persons who provide money for wives and infants, ultra vires borrowing and in executorships—and ought not to be extended. He submitted also, mainly on the authority of some remarks of Lord Eldon LC in *Craythorne v Swinburne*¹, that the right of subrogation arises not as a matter of law but as the result of contract to be implied between the parties. And since the right arises by the effect of an implied contract it cannot, so the argument ran, arise where the facts are such that the parties cannot be taken to have intended it. To exclude the notion that here the parties impliedly contracted that Camerons should be subrogated to Fords' rights against any of its employees, counsel for the fourth party relied first on the existence of an agreement between the members of the British Insurance Association of which Fords' insurers were a member. By this agreement entered into, as I understand it, following the decision in *Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd*² the parties agreed, inter alia, not to sue their assured's servant whose negligence gave rise to a right of action against their assured. The agreement, however, only extended to preclude an insurer making a claim against the insured's employee in respect of injury to a fellow employee. f

In the second place, counsel for the fourth party relied on evidence that Fords as a matter of principle, for reasons which are sufficiently obvious, never sue their negligent servants; that Fords were aware of the British Insurance Association agreement; and that Fords could not be expected to enter into an agreement which would or might entitle the other party in their name to do what they themselves would not contemplate doing. g a part—both parties. If, he said, counsel for the fourth party's submissions were right—with the effect that the right of subrogation was in all cases (I emphasise those words) a matter of implication of the presumed intention of both parties and that the onus of establishing such a right or terms in the contract was on Camerons, there would be much force in the submission. But he added that if this were so he would have to consider whether the test should not be that of an objective observer not aware of secret reservations on the part of one party.

b Basic to counsel for the fourth party's submissions was that the right of subrogation, assuming its existence on the facts of the present case, arises as a matter of implication of a contract between Camerons and Fords. I agree with Hollings J that that submission is not well-founded and that the right arises from the nature of the express contract of indemnity into which they entered as part of their agreement and as a necessary incident of that contract of indemnity, and not by the effect of a contract to be implied between them. That the provisions contained in the contract between Camerons and Fords was a contract of indemnity cannot be doubted. Under a contract of indemnity he who is indemnified must bring into account for the benefit of the other party all benefits received or recoverable by him, or otherwise he would be getting more than he is entitled to. There is high authority first that this is the basis of the doctrine of subrogation as it applies to a contract of indemnity, and second, that the right of subrogation which insurers have under a policy of insurance to the remedies of their assured when they have paid the loss, arises not because contracts of insurance are a special class of contracts in which the right of subrogation exists, but because a policy of assurance is a contract of indemnity. When a policy of assurance secures payment of a specified sum on the happening of a specified event a right of subrogation does not normally arise. Nor can I accept the submission that the five classes of case in which the right arises and to which counsel for the fourth party referred are by any means exhaustive: see Rowlatt on Principal and Surety¹.

e In *Simpson v Thomson*² Lord Cairns LC, dealing with the liability of insurers under an insurance policy, said:

f 'I know of no foundation for the right of underwriters, except the well-known principle of law, that where one person has agreed to indemnify another, he will, on making good the indemnity, be entitled to succeed to all the ways and means by which the person indemnified might have protected himself against or reimbursed himself for the loss. It is on this principle that the underwriters of a ship that has been lost are entitled to the ship in specie if they can find and recover it; and it is on the same principle that they can assert any right which the owner of the ship might have asserted against a wrongdoer for damage for the act which has caused the loss.'

g The right of subrogation which an insurer has accordingly depends not, as was submitted, on some special rule applicable to contracts of insurance but stems from the wider principle stated by Lord Cairns LC. The law is well stated in the judgment of Cotton LJ in *Castellain v Preston*³:

h 'I think that the question turns on the consideration of what a policy of insurance against fire is, and on that the right of the plaintiff depends. The policy is really a contract to indemnify the person insured for the loss which he has sustained in consequence of the peril insured against which has happened, and from that it follows, of course, that as it is only a contract of indemnity, it is only to pay that loss which the assured may have sustained by reason of the fire which has occurred. In order to ascertain what that loss is, everything must be taken into account which is received by and comes to the hand of the assured, and which diminishes that loss. It is only the amount of the loss, when it is considered as a contract of indemnity, which is to be paid after taking into account and estimating those benefits or sums of money which the assured may have received in diminution of the loss.' a

3 (1883) 11 QBD 380 at 393, cf [1881-85] All ER Rep 493 at 498

And then a little later he quotes¹ the judgment of Lord Blackburn in *Burnand v Rodocanachi*²: b

"The general rule of law (and it is obvious justice) is that where there is a contract of indemnity (it matters not whether it is a marine policy or a policy against fire on land, or any other contract of indemnity), and a loss happens, anything which reduces or diminishes that loss reduces or diminishes the amount which the indemnifier is bound to pay; and if the indemnifier has already paid it, then, if anything which diminishes the loss comes into the hands of the person to whom he has paid it, it becomes an equity that the person who has already paid the full indemnity is entitled to be recouped by having that amount back.'" c

"It seems to me that a good deal of confusion would be caused, if one were to suppose that insurers are in the position of sureties. A surety is a person who answers for the default of another, and an insurer is a person who guarantees against loss by an event. The default or non-default of another, as between that other and the person who is insured, may diminish or increase the loss; but what the insurer is guaranteeing is not the default of that person, he is guaranteeing that no loss shall happen by the event. And subrogation is itself only the particular application of the principle of indemnity to a special subject matter, and there I think is where the learned judge has gone wrong. He has taken the term "subrogation" and has applied it as if it were a hard and fast line, instead of seeing that it is part of the law of indemnity. If there are means of diminishing the loss, the insurer may pursue them, whether he is asking for contracts to be carried out in the name of the assured, or whether he is suing for tort. It is said that the law only gives the underwriters the right to stand in the assured's shoes as to rights which arise out of, or in consequence of, the loss. I venture to think there is absolutely no authority for that proposition. The true test is, can the right to be insisted on be deemed to be one the enforcement of which will diminish the loss?" e

That the right of subrogation under a contract of indemnity arises from the very nature of the contract of indemnity itself—a contract to indemnify against a loss and not to put the party to be indemnified in a better position than he would have been had there been no loss—is, in my judgment, far too deeply embedded in our law to admit of its application only where it can be shown that there was an implied agreement that it should be applicable. f

As I have said, counsel for the fourth party based his submission that the doctrine of subrogation rests on an implied contract on observations of Lord Eldon LC in *Craythorne v Swinburne*⁴ where he said: g

"Upon the relation of principal and surety some things are very clear. It has been long settled, that, if there are co-sureties by the same instrument, and the creditor calls upon either of them to pay the principal debt, or any part of it, h a that surety has a right in this Court, either upon a principle of equity, or upon contract, to call upon his co-surety for contribution; and I think, that right is properly enough stated as depending rather upon a principle of equity than upon contract: unless in this sense; that, the principle of equity being in its operation established, a contract may be inferred upon the implied knowledge b of that principle by all persons, and it must be upon such a ground, of implied assumpsit, that in modern times Courts of Law have assumed a jurisdiction upon this subject; a jurisdiction convenient enough in a case simple and uncomplicated; but attended with great difficulty, where the sureties are numerous . . .

As the learned judge in the court below remarked, Lord Eldon LC was there stating that the principle of contribution between co-sureties was a principle of equity and that the 'implied assumpsit' was, in effect, an implied knowledge of that c principle by all persons. The remarks were, in any event, directed not to the right of subrogation under a contract of indemnity, but to the right of contribution between co-sureties; but even if they be applied to the former situation, they do not in my judgment support the wider submission that only where the parties must be taken so to have intended does the right of contribution or subrogation arise.

Even if the submission based on the implication of intention were accepted its d application to the facts of the present case would present difficulty. The contract in cl 6 (b) is a contract to indemnify Fords against 'losses and claims . . . in respect of injuries or damage to any person or property'. Are Camerons, because the parties cannot be taken to have intended that Camerons should have by subrogation a right to sue Fords' servants, to be taken not to have stipulated for a right of subrogation in respect of Fords' rights against a third party not being their servant who damages e Fords' property? If, as is submitted, the parties cannot be taken to have intended any right of subrogation, Camerons will have none of the rights which have been held to be an incident of a contract of indemnity: and Fords having received payment from Camerons of the damage suffered to their property, will be in a position to recover it again from the person who caused the damage. In order to succeed on this appeal Fords must, as I see it, introduce into the contract a term that notwithstanding f the rights of subrogation arising under the contract those rights shall not be exercised against an employee of Fords. It was not the case put by the fourth party that the parties must be taken impliedly to have agreed to exclude a right of subrogation where the party to be sued was an employee of Fords but that the burden of showing the existence of the right was on the party claiming it to establish it by showing an implied agreement to that effect. On the case as put, it might have been enough g to show that one of the parties, namely Fords, could not be taken to have so agreed.
But once the position is reached that under a contract of indemnity the right exists in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, in order to exclude it by the effect of an implied term you must, as I understand the law, conclude that had the absence of an express term to that effect been called to their attention both parties would have said in effect 'we did not bother to express it, it is too clear' (see Reigate v Union h *Manufacturing Co (Ramsbottom)*¹). The judge found that it was neither proved nor admitted that Camerons knew of the existence of the British Insurance Association agreement; but even apart from that finding I can only guess at what Camerons would have said had the point been drawn to their attention at the time they contracted to indemnify Fords.

I agree with the judgment of Hollings J.

i I have taken the same view as that of Lord Denning MR regarding the basis of the right of subrogation which arises on a contract of indemnity. He, relying on the equitable nature of the right, takes the view that it ought not to be exercisable where its exercise would be inequitable and that this is just such a case. This was no part of the fourth party's case which, as I have said, rested on the submission that the doctrine arose by the effect of an implied term. I am not persuaded that the third party might not be able to muster powerful and perhaps convincing arguments to the effect that the right of subrogation ought not to be cut down by consideration of what the court might think in any particular case would lead to an inequitable result. Nor am I persuaded that the court has before it all the facts necessary on which to form such an opinion. The point is not foreshadowed in the pleadings: and because the fourth party has not taken it and the third party has had no opportunity of dealing with it, I would express no opinion on it without having further argument.

I would dismiss the appeal.

JAMES LJ. Eric Morris, the plaintiff, a servant of Cameron Industrial Services Ltd, the third party, was employed at the Ford Motor Co's, the defendants', premises at Halewood. On 26th January 1969 in the course of his employment the plaintiff suffered injury when his leg was trapped against a wall by reason of the negligent driving of a fork-lift truck by Frederick Roberts in the course of his employment by the defendants. The plaintiff sued the defendants alleging that the negligence of their servant, Roberts, caused his injuries. The defendants eventually settled the plaintiff's claim for £686.95 and £305.69 costs. The defendants brought into the action the third party, claiming against them an indemnity in respect of the defendants' liability to the plaintiff. The claim was based on a contract between the defendants and the third party. The contract provided for the third party to perform for reward cleaning services at the defendants' factory. It included the defendants' general clauses of contract. The relevant clause is cl 6 (b), (c) and (d).

'(b) The Contractor shall indemnify the Purchaser against all losses and claims of whatsoever nature for or in respect of injuries or damage to any person or property howsoever caused arising out of or in connection with the performance of the Order and also against all claims, demands, proceedings, damages, costs, charges and expenses whatsoever in respect thereof or in relation thereto, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing the Contractor shall be liable to indemnify the Purchaser under this clause whether the loss or claim is occasioned by or arises from the negligence or breach of statutory duty of the Purchaser, the Contractor or any sub-Contractor or their respective servants or agents.

'(c) The Contractor shall insure and keep insured during the continuance of the order in the joint names of the Purchaser and the Contractor all liabilities which may attach to them or either of them for any injury, loss or damage to any person or property arising out of or in connection with the performance of the order. This sub paragraph is in addition to and not in derogation of sub paragraph (b) of this clause. Provided nevertheless that (a) (b) and (c) above shall not apply when the enquiry or order is subject to the I.M.E. and I.E.E. General Conditions of Contract or to the General Conditions of Contract issued by the Institute of Civil Engineers.

'(d) The Insurance referred to in sub paragraph (c) of this clause shall be effected in such sum as may be agreed, but in any event for not less than an indemnity of £100,000 any one accident or series of accidents arising out of one event and the Contractor shall produce for inspection to the Purchaser as and when the Purchaser may require it, such policy or policies of insurance and all premiums and renewal receipts.

'N.B. YOU ARE ADVISED TO ARRANGE IF NECESSARY FOR THE EXTENSION OF YOUR EMPLOYERS LIABILITY AND THIRD PARTY POLICIES TO INCLUDE YOUR CONTRACTUAL LIABILITY HAVING REGARDS PARTICULARLY TO CLAUSE (6) (a) AND (b).'

a Pursuant to those terms of the contract the third party conceded liability to indemnify the defendants. The third party sought relief against Mr Roberts, the negligent truck driver, and brought him into the action as fourth party.

b The claim against the fourth party was formulated thus: (i) he was a joint tort-feasor with his employers, the defendants, and he had broken his contract with the defendants in failing to exercise reasonable care in the performance of his work as their servant; (ii) it followed that the defendants had a right against him to be indemnified against their liability to the plaintiff; (iii) having indemnified the defendants under the terms of the contract between them, the third party was entitled to step into the shoes of the defendants and succeed to their rights against their servant, the fourth party, by way of subrogation.

c The fourth party admitted his negligence, but denied that, in the circumstances, the contract between the defendants and the third party gave rise to any right of subrogation. It was common ground that if there was liability on the part of the fourth party to the third party, it could arise only when the third party had in fact indemnified the defendants. This had not been done at the date of trial. By consent of both the parties involved the hearing was conducted on the basis that the claim against the fourth party was for a declaration that he should indemnify the third party in the event of the third party indemnifying the defendants. The learned judge, in a reserved judgment, held that the third party was entitled to the declaration sought. The fourth party appeals against that decision.

d It has been necessary to consider the foundation on which the principle of subrogation rests and the circumstances which give rise to rights of subrogation. Its origin in the courts of this country is obscure. McCardie J in *John Edwards & Co v Motor Union Insurance Co*¹ stated that it is derived from the system of Roman law. It found a place in the courts of chancery and the common law courts. The circumstances in which the right has been recognised have been carefully limited. To permit a person to stand in the place of another, to have without assignment the rights and remedies of that other and to give the right to enforce those remedies in the name of the other person, is a departure from ordinary principles justifiable only where equity demanded that it should be so or where the courts of law, acting on the basis that the parties must have entered into a relationship in knowledge of the equitable right, applied the same principle.

e The principle was established in the 18th century in relation to those who provided money to a wife or an infant for necessities (*Harris v Lee*² and *Marlow v Pitfield*³). It was applied in contracts of suretyship thus enabling the surety to stand in the place of the creditor (*Re Lord Churchill, Manisty v Churchill*⁴). Where there were more than one surety, though each be bound separately, a contractual term was implied between them so that one could obtain contribution from another who had paid less than his share of the debt or not paid at all (*Craythorne v Swinburne*⁵). Lord Eldon LC said⁶:

h 'It has been long settled, that, if there are co-sureties by the same instrument, and the creditor calls upon either of them to pay the principal debt, or any part of it, that surety has a right in this Court, either upon a principle of equity, or upon contract, to call upon his co-surety for contribution; and I think, that right is properly enough stated as depending rather upon a principle of equity than upon contract; unless in this sense; that, the principle of equity being in its operation established, a contract may be inferred upon the implied knowledge of that principle by all persons, and it must be upon such a ground, of implied assumpsit, that in modern times Courts of Law have assumed a jurisdiction upon this subject.' a

And now we come closer to the problems of the present case. The right has become established in what counsel for the fourth party calls 'contracts of insurance which are contracts of indemnity only', and what counsel for the third party calls 'contracts of indemnity only'.

In *Mason v Sainsbury*¹ Lord Mansfield speaking of the nature of the contract of insurance said: 'It is an indemnity. Every day the insurer is put in the place of the insured. . . The insurer uses the name of the insured.' In *Simpson v Thomson*² Lord Cairns LC, dealing with the right of subrogation claimed by the underwriters, said: b

'I know of no foundation for the right of underwriters, except the well-known principle of law, that when one person has agreed to indemnify another, he will, on making good the indemnity, be entitled to succeed to all the ways and means by which the person indemnified might have protected himself against or reimbursed himself for the loss.' c

Lord Selborne LC, in *Burnand v Rodocanachi*³, referred to the 'right by way of subrogation or substitution to which by the true legal result of the contract the insurer is entitled.' Lord Blackburn said⁴: d

'The general rule of law (and it is obvious justice) is that where there is a contract of indemnity (it matters not whether it is a marine policy, or a policy against fire on land, or any other contract of indemnity) and a loss happens, anything which reduces or diminishes that loss reduces or diminishes the amount which the indemnifier is bound to pay; and if the indemnifier has already paid it, then, if anything which diminishes the loss comes into the hands of the person to whom he has paid it, it becomes an equity that the person who has already paid the full indemnity is entitled to be recouped by having that amount back.' e

In the present case both parties seek to draw support from *Castellain v Preston*⁵. f Counsel for the fourth party relies on a passage in the judgment of Brett LJ⁶ expressing that the right of subrogation sprang from the nature of the contract being an insurance contract:

'In order to give my opinion upon this case, I feel obliged to revert to the very foundation of every rule which has been promulgated and acted on by the Courts with regard to insurance law. The very foundation, in my opinion, of every rule which has been applied to insurance law is this, namely, that the contract of insurance contained in a marine or fire policy is a contract of indemnity, and of indemnity only, and that this contract means that the assured, in case of a loss against which the policy has been made, shall be fully indemnified, but shall never be more than fully indemnified. That is the fundamental principle of insurance, and if ever a proposition is brought forward which is at variance with it, that is to say, which either will prevent the assured from obtaining a full indemnity, or which will give to the assured more than a full indemnity, that proposition must certainly be wrong.' g a Counsel for the third party relies on passages in the other judgments as emphasising that it was the feature of indemnity, inherent in the contract of insurance, on which the plaintiff's right to recover rested. Per Cotton LJ¹:

b 'I think that the question turns on the consideration of what a policy of insurance against fire is, and on that the right of the plaintiff depends. The policy is really a contract to indemnify the person insured for the loss which he has sustained in consequence of the peril insured against which has happened, and from that it follows, of course, that as it is only a contract of indemnity, it is only to pay that loss which the assured may have sustained by reason of the fire which has occurred. . . . It is only the amount of the loss, when it is considered as a contract of indemnity, which is to be paid after taking into account and estimating those benefits or sums of money which the assured may have received in diminution of the loss.'

d 'And subrogation is itself only the particular application of the principle of indemnity to a special subject matter, and there I think is where the learned judge has gone wrong. He has taken the term "subrogation" and has applied it as if it were a hard and fast line, instead of seeing that it is part of the law of indemnity. If there are means of diminishing the loss, the insurer may pursue them, whether he is asking for contracts to be carried out in the name of the assured, or whether he is suing for tort. It is said that the law only gives the underwriters the right to stand in the assured's shoes as to rights which arise out of, or in consequence of, the loss. I venture to think there is absolutely no authority for that proposition. The true test is, can the right to be insisted on be deemed to be on the enforcement of which will diminish the loss? In this case the right whatever it be has been actually enforced, and all that we have to consider is whether the fruit of that right after it is enforced does not belong to the insurers. It is insisted that only those payments are to be taken into consideration which have been made in respect of the loss. I ask why, and where is the authority? f If the payment diminishes the loss, to my mind it falls within the application of the law of indemnity.'

g In *Yorkshire Insurance Co Ltd v Nisbet Shipping Co Ltd*³ the plaintiff insurers sought to recover from the assured, to whom they had paid £72,000 on a total loss basis, the sum of nearly £127,000 which the assured had been paid by the Canadian Government in respect of the loss. It was held that the excess over £72,000 was not recoverable. Diplock J said⁴:

h 'The expression "subrogation" in relation to a contract of marine insurance is thus no more than a convenient way of referring to those terms which are to be implied in the contract between the assured and the insurer to give business efficacy to an agreement whereby the assured in the case of a loss against which the policy has been made shall be fully indemnified, and never more than fully indemnified. . . . In my view the doctrine of subrogation in insurance law requires one to imply in contracts of marine insurance only such terms as are necessary to ensure that notwithstanding that the insurer has made a payment under the policy, the assured shall not be entitled to retain, as against the insurer, a greater sum than what is shown to be his actual loss.'

The learned judge then cites¹ the words of Cotton LJ in *Castellain v Preston*²:

“... if there is a money or any other benefit received which ought to be taken into account in diminishing the loss or in ascertaining what the real loss is against which the contract of indemnity is given, the indemnifier ought to be allowed to take advantage of it in order to calculate what the real loss is...”

In my judgment the right of subrogation in contracts of insurance depends on the essential element of the contract being one of indemnity. Moreover, I can find no authority for the proposition that the right is restricted to ‘contracts of insurance of indemnity only’. Where there is a contract of indemnity there exists a right in the indemnifier to reimburse himself to the extent that he has paid, and to this end the law provides that he can exercise the personal rights and remedies of the person indemnified by proceeding in that person’s name.

Is this present case one of a contract of indemnity? I think it is. Counsel for the fourth party argues that it is a contract for cleaning services not a contract of indemnity. But what of a covenant in a lease on the part of a tenant to indemnify the landlord against damage to third persons caused by acts of the tenant? It cannot be said that such is no indemnity because it is in a lease. Clause 6, in my judgment, is in its terms a contract whereby the third party agrees to indemnify the defendant company and the nature of the contract does not change because it is one of a number of terms of another contract.

It is argued by counsel for the fourth party that it is not necessary to give business efficacy to cl 6 that a term should be implied that the third party should, on indemnifying the defendants, by subrogation be able to exercise the defendants’ rights and remedies against others. He argues that the facts are such that it cannot be said that such an implied term is so necessary that the parties to the contract must be taken to have contracted on that basis. I am unable to accept those arguments. I do not consider that it is a question of implying a term importing a right of subrogation: the right is there in the nature of the contract of indemnity, unless it can be shown that the contract expressly or by implication excludes the right of subrogation either wholly or in part. It is open to parties to a contract of indemnity to contract on the terms of their choice, and by the terms they choose they can exclude rights which would otherwise attach to the contract.

In relation to counsel for the fourth party’s argument that there is no necessity to imply, and it would be wrong to imply, a term entitling the third party to exercise the defendants’ remedy against the fourth party, in view of the relationship between the defendants and the fourth party, I would look at the matter in a different way. I pose the question, is there evidence which establishes that this contract of indemnity excluded, expressly or impliedly, the right of subrogation to the defendants’ rights and remedies against a servant of the defendants? If there is then the third party is not entitled to the declaration. If there is not, then the ordinary incidents of a contract of indemnity entitle the third party to succeed.

The contract incorporating the indemnity clause was made on 18th February 1969. It was admitted as between the defendants and third party that the contract was for the third party ‘to supply all labour, plant, and to carry out cleaning services at the premises of the defendants’. The terms of cl 6 provided for indemnity to the fullest possible extent and, in particular, refer to losses and claims occasioned by or arising from negligence of servants or agents of the defendants. The third party was required to insure against the liabilities within the scope of the indemnity.

This contract was made some 12 years after the decision in *Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd*³ and after the report of the inter-departmental committee a appointed in 1957 by the Minister of Labour and National Service to study the implications of the judgments in that case as they might affect the relations between employers and workers. The report was published in 1959.

b In *Lister's case*¹ an employee of the company employed to drive a motor vehicle injured his father whom he had taken as his mate. The father recovered damages from the company on the ground of his son's negligence in driving the vehicle. The company then sued the driver on the ground that he was a joint tortfeasor against whom the company was entitled to contribution and on the ground that the company was entitled to damages for breach of an implied term that he would exercise reasonable care in the performance of his duties as servant. It was held, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Somervell of Harrow dissenting, that there was no implied term in the contract of employment that the employers would indemnify the servant (whether the company was insured against the servant's negligence or was required by statute to be insured against that risk or ought, as a reasonably prudent employer, to have taken out a policy of insurance against that risk) and that the company was entitled to recover damages from the driver, their servant. That represents the present law.

c The inter-departmental committee reached the following conclusions:

d 'The decision in the *Lister case*¹ shows that employers and their insurers have rights against employees which, if exploited unreasonably, would endanger good industrial relations. We think that employers and insurers, if only in their own interests, will not so exploit their rights and the evidence we have received as to the action taken by the British Employers' Confederation and the insurance industry seems to us to support this view. We do not therefore think that the decision in the *Lister case*¹ has exposed a practical problem or that there is any need for legislation at present. If in future it should appear that employers or insurers were exploiting their rights unreasonably, the problem would, we think, have to be reviewed; in that event further consideration might be given to the possible legislative measures which we have mentioned in our Report and the various objections to them. Our conclusion does not, however, rule out any further effort to deal with the matter by voluntary methods, such as an extension of the 'gentleman's agreement' within the insurance field, or by collective bargaining in any individual industry.'

e The report and the conclusions of the committee were considered by the legislative committee of the British Insurance Association with the result that the association's then deputy chairman wrote a letter, dated 23rd October 1959, to all members of the association. The letter is an agreed document in the present case. It appears from that piece of evidence that the BIA committee felt—

f 'that Insurers generally would agree that the common interest of all demands that, save possibly in case of collusion or wilful misconduct, no action should come before the Courts which would redirect attention to the issues involved in *Lister's case*¹.'

g The writer of the letter invited the addressees, in their common interest (a) to confirm adherence to a revised 'gentleman's agreement' as follows:

h 'Employers' Liability Insurers agree that they will not institute a claim against the employee of an insured employer in respect of death of or injury to a fellow-employee, unless the weight of evidence clearly indicates (1) collusion or (2) wilful misconduct, on the part of the employee against whom the claim is made. The agreement shall apply in priority to the provisions of any claims agreement operating between Insurers who subscribe to this agreement.'

i The reference to a revised agreement relates to an earlier agreement in 1953.

The letter expressly disavows any intention of interfering with the rights of members to deal with their own claims, and asserted the purpose of affording an opportunity of avoiding action which might damage the interests of insurers as a whole. The proposed 'gentleman's agreement' was limited to claims in respect of 'death of or injury to a fellow employee'. The present cases does not fall within that limited area as the plaintiff was not a fellow employee of the fourth party. a

The evidence, however, goes further. Evidence was given by Mr Davidson, a labour relations officer employed on the central staff of the defendant company. He said that the defendants never sued their servants; that the defendants were aware that to pursue action against an employee for negligence would be to court industrial action in the form of strikes; that serious industrial repercussions would follow if the defendants entered into contracts with others, under the terms of which contracts the employees of the defendants might be sued by the other contracting party, or insurers, in an action brought in the name of the defendants. b

There is no evidence that the defendants' attitude to possible action against their employees was expressly brought to the attention of the third party at the time of contracting. It is, in my judgment, impossible to say that any right of subrogation was expressly excluded by the terms of the contract from the provision for indemnity. What of implied exclusion? The court cannot shut its eyes to the realities of the situation. In 1969 the implications of the law as confirmed and decided in Lister's case¹ were well known among employers (the defendants included). Employers' liability insurance, despite the absence of any legal obligation owed by an employer to his employee to insure against liability for negligence, was commonly if not universally used as the means of satisfying the liability of the servant; the industrial repercussions referred to in Mr Davidson's evidence would, as a matter of common knowledge, be of general application and not confined to the defendants. There is an express indication in the terms of the note following cl 6 that the contracting parties recognised that any loss or claim within the indemnity should rest with the third party or their insurers. The defendants had adopted a policy renouncing their entitlement to sue their servants for negligence. c

The point is finely balanced but, in my judgment, the terms of this indemnity in the context of this contract do not give rise to a right of subrogation in the third party. The terms do not give rise to that right because there is to be implied a term whereby it is excluded. The implied term springs from the nature and terms of the contract between these parties. Their agreement was operative in an industrial setting in which subrogation of the third party to the rights and remedies of the defendants against their employees would be unacceptable and unrealistic. d

When a person who has been convicted of a motoring offence is disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence, the period of disqualification starts to run as soon as it is ordered, save where the 'totting-up' provisions of s 93 (3) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 apply. Accordingly, unless the 'totting-up' provisions apply, a period of disqualification runs concurrently with any other period of disqualification ordered by the same court at the same hearing or by the same or another court on a previous occasion; the court has no power to make a period of disqualification consecutive on another period of disqualification.

Appeal

On 13th October 1969 at Sheffield Assizes the applicant, Kelvin Thomas Meese, pleaded guilty to causing death by dangerous driving contrary to s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1960 and to driving with a blood-alcohol proportion above the prescribed limit contrary to s 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was sentenced by Lyell J to nine months' imprisonment concurrent on each count and also disqualified for holding a driving licence for 2½ years consecutive on each count, making five years' disqualification in all. He applied for leave to appeal out of time against the orders of disqualification. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Peter M Baker for the applicant.

h

BEAN J delivered the judgment of the court at the invitation of Edmund Davies LJ. On 31st October 1969 at Sheffield Assizes the applicant pleaded guilty to one count of causing death by dangerous driving and a second count of driving a motor vehicle with excess alcohol in his blood. He was sentenced on each count to nine months' imprisonment concurrent and he was disqualified for 2½ years on each count consecutively, making a total disqualification of five years. He now applies for an extension of time, albeit some three years 1½ months after sentence, and for leave to appeal against sentence. The grounds for extension of time are that he was only recently advised that the order making the orders for disqualification might be invalid and that he had grounds for an appeal.

The facts shortly were that on 22nd January 1969 at about 10.40 p m the applicant was driving his car in Conisbrough. He had a lady sitting in the front passenger seat and as the car approached a sharp right-hand bend at fast speed it mounted the traffic island and crossed the pavement. The car was extensively damaged by hitting a wall, both the occupants were seriously injured and unfortunately the lady suffered fatal injuries. At about 2.35 a m the applicant was interviewed, a breath test was administered and a blood sample was taken from him which on analysis was found to contain 105 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood. The applicant himself could not remember a single thing about the accident.

It is in those circumstances that counsel for the applicant invites the court to say that in accordance with several recent cases it is manifest that these consecutive periods of disqualification should not be sustained. Disqualification starts to run as soon as it is ordered, save where s 5 (5) of the Road Traffic Act 1962, now replaced by s 93 (5) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, applies. Thus, except where the 'totting-up' provisions under s 93 (3) of the 1972 Act (formerly s 5 (3) of the 1962 Act) apply, disqualifications run concurrently both with those ordered by the same court at the same hearing and with those previously ordered by the same or another court on another occasion. In 1969, when the orders being considered were made, the position under s 5 (5) of the 1962 Act was that a consecutive period of disqualification could also be ordered on conviction for driving while disqualified, but that provision was repealed by s 1 of the Road Traffic (Disqualification) Act 1970. Apart from the exceptions referred to, there is no power to make a sentence of disqualification consecutive on another period of disqualification: see *R v Higgins*¹, a Court of Criminal Appeal case. The two offences to which this applicant pleaded guilty, namely causing death by dangerous driving contrary to s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1960 and driving a motor car with excess alcohol in his blood contrary to s 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967, do not fall within the exceptions under s 5 (5) of the 1962 Act.

It follows that consecutive orders of disqualification could not be imposed, there being no power, apart from statutory authority, to make a sentence of disqualification consecutive with another period of disqualification: see *R v Graham*², *R v Johnston*³ and *R v Bain*⁴. Accordingly we extend the time for appealing, direct that this hearing be treated as the hearing of the appeal and order that the order of Lyell J be varied by making the two periods of disqualification concurrent, that is 2½ years in all.

Application granted. Appeal allowed. Order of disqualification varied.

Smith v Automobile Proprietary Ltd

SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS, MR R BOYFIELD AND MR H ROBERTS

19th MARCH 1973

Industrial tribunal – Procedure – Originating application – Form of application – Contents of application – Address of person or persons against whom relief is sought – Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972 (SI 1972 No 38), Sch, r 1 (1).

An employee was dismissed by his employers, the Royal Automobile Club, so that his employment was effectively terminated on 21st April 1972. By virtue of r 2 (1)^a of the schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972^b the period within which the employee could present a claim for unfair dismissal expired on 18th May 1972. On 12th May 1972 the employee's solicitors wrote to the Central Office of Industrial Tribunals a letter indicating that, on the available information, the employee had been unfairly dismissed and requesting that the letter be taken as formal notification that the employee wished to bring a complaint before an industrial tribunal. The letter contained the name and address of the employee and the name but not the address of the employers. An industrial tribunal held that the solicitors' letter did not constitute an originating application within the meaning of r 1 (1)^c of the schedule to the 1972 regulations and dismissed the employee's complaint on the ground that it was out of time. The employee appealed.

Held – Rule 1 (1) did not require that an originating application be made in any particular form; it was sufficient if the application contained the information required under r 1 (1). Looked at as a whole the letter from the employee's solicitors did contain all the information necessary in the circumstances; the object of requiring the employer's address to be given was to ensure that the tribunal could thereafter communicate with the party to be named as the respondent to the proceedings; as the RAC were a well-known organisation their address would be known to the tribunal and the omission of it was not a ground for holding that the application was invalid. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed and the matter would be referred back to the tribunal to determine the substantive issue (see 1107 d to f, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Ronald Charles Smith against the decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman Sir John Blagden) sitting in Bury St Edmunds, dated 13th November 1972, that they had no jurisdiction to entertain the appellant's complaint of unfair dismissal against the respondents, Automobile Proprietary Ltd, as it was not presented before the end of the period prescribed by r 2 (1) of the rules of procedure in the schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations etc) Regulations 1972

^a Rule 2 (1), so far as material, provides: 'In relation to proceedings on complaints under section 106 of the [Industrial Relations Act 1971], a tribunal shall not entertain such a complaint unless it is presented before the end of the period of four weeks beginning—(a) in the case of a complaint relating to dismissal, with the effective date of termination . . . unless the tribunal is satisfied that in the circumstances it was not practicable for the complaint to be presented before the end of that period . . .'

^c Rule 1 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 1106 j to p 1107 a, post and they were not satisfied that in the circumstances it was not practicable for it to have been presented before the end of that period. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. a

Mr N A C Butcher, solicitor, for the respondents.

SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by Mr R C Smith from a decision of an industrial tribunal sitting at Bury St Edmunds dismissing his application for compensation on the ground of unfair dismissal. The tribunal held that they had no jurisdiction to entertain the application because the appellant had failed to make it in due time. Perhaps I should say at the outset that the respondents, Automobile Proprietary Ltd (more commonly referred to as the 'RAC') expressed no desire to take a technical point and have said throughout that they would rather have the matter determined on its merits. b

The short history of the case is that the appellant was dismissed on 21st April 1972 and thus, in accordance with the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972¹, he had 28 days within which to make a complaint of unfair dismissal. That period expired on 18th May 1972. He was a member of a staff association, which retained solicitors in Gloucester to act on its behalf. The appellant was put in touch with the solicitors who, being mindful of the 28 days' time limit, wrote on 12th May 1972 to the Central Office of Industrial Tribunals for the express purpose of preserving the appellant's right to bring a complaint for unfair dismissal. I should read that letter. It reads as follows: c

'Dear Sir,

'We act for Mr. R. C. Smith of 12 Hingham Road, Great Ellingham, Attleborough, Norfolk. Mr. Smith was until recently employed by the Royal Automobile Club through their proprietary company the [Automobile] Proprietary Ltd. as a Road Patrol/Sales Representative. By a letter dated 6th March [1972] Mr. Smith received six weeks' notice to terminate his employment, termination taking effect on Friday the 21st April [1972]. The reasons for Mr. Smith's sudden and peremptory dismissal were not officially given to him and we have not yet been able to obtain a satisfactory statement of the reasons for his dismissal. It was suggested that there may have been some redundancy but as Mr. Smith was the only person dismissed in his area and other reasons have been hinted it does appear to us on the information at present available that this could be a clear example of an unfair dismissal. We have written to the Royal Automobile Club to try and obtain a clear statement for the reasons for Mr. Smith's dismissal, but in view of the time limit imposed under the Industrial Relations Act 1971 we would be obliged if you could take this letter as a formal notification to you on behalf of our client, Mr. R. C. Smith, of his complaint that he therefore wishes to bring his claim before the Industrial Tribunal. We appreciate that you will probably require information and facts from us but in order to preserve our client's rights within the time limits of the Act could you please confirm that this letter will be accepted as formal notification of our client's complaint.' d

Rule 1 of the rules of procedure under the schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972 provides essential elements to be contained in an application to commence proceedings: e

'(1) Proceedings for the determination of any matter by a tribunal shall be instituted by the applicant ... sending to the Secretary of the Tribunals an f

a originating application which shall be in writing and shall set out:—(a) the name and address of the applicant; and (b) the names and addresses of the person or persons against whom relief is sought or of the parties to the proceedings before the court (as the case may be); and (c) the grounds on which that relief is sought ...’

b Subparagraph (1) (d) is not relevant to the consideration of this appeal. Be it observed that there is no requirement that any particular form shall be used. In fact, for the convenience of litigants a form has been prepared and is available throughout the country at employment exchanges and at the offices of the tribunals. In the ordinary course of events, when people become more familiar with these regulations and the practice of the court, one would hope that this form will be used by litigants when commencing their applications; but we repeat that it is not mandatory, and an application will not fail merely because the form is not used, provided such application contains the necessary information required by r 1.

The chairman of the tribunal formed the view that the letter of 12th May 1972 did not constitute an application within the meaning of r 1.

d The letter did not contain the address of the respondents, but to hold that an application should be considered bad merely because it does not give the address of an organisation as well known as the RAC would be mere pedantry. The object of requiring the address to be given is to ensure that the tribunal can thereafter communicate with the party who is to be named as the respondent to the proceedings. The address of the RAC would undoubtedly be known to the tribunal. We cannot regard the omission of the address as a reason for viewing this as other than a proper application. It is to be observed that it was not on that ground that the e tribunal felt obliged to reject the application.

Looking at the letter of 12th May 1972 as a whole, we have come to the conclusion that the only fair construction that can be put on it is that it was an adequate presentation of a complaint pursuant to r 1 (1) of the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972. It refers in its text to unfair dismissal; it is quite clear from the context that the solicitors have in mind that there may well have been an unfair dismissal; and when one reads the final part of the letter it is quite apparent that the only purpose of sending the letter was to preserve their client's rights within the 28 day limit.

f As we have come to the conclusion that the letter of 12th May 1972 is to be regarded as a proper application within the meaning of the regulations, it is unnecessary for us to express any views on the further matters debated in the course of the original hearing. This appeal will therefore be allowed and the matter referred to the tribunal for hearing on the substantive issue.

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC, LORD REID, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, LORD GUEST AND LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA
5th, 6th JUNE, 4th JULY 1973

Criminal law – Affray – Unlawful fighting – Only one person fighting unlawfully – Whether one person alone may be guilty of offence.

Criminal law – Affray – Unlawful fighting – Fight – Meaning — Display of force – Whether violence a necessary element.

Criminal law – Affray – Terror – Bystanders – Proof that bystanders might reasonably be expected to have been frightened – Unnecessary to prove actual fear – Whether necessary to prove presence of bystanders who could have been frightened.

A person may be guilty of making an affray even if, although others are fighting, he alone is fighting unlawfully to the terror of other persons (see p 1109 g, p 1111 g, p 1113 c, p 1114 g, and p 1116 b g and j to p 1117 a, post).

Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC. An affray involves unlawful fighting, or a display of force, by one or more persons, but the word 'fight' is not to be construed as implying that there must be a reciprocity of blows; it must however include at least an unlawful participation in a violent breach of the peace where the requisite degree of terror is achieved (see p 1112 c, post).

Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC. The degree of violence required to constitute an affray must be such as might reasonably be expected to terrify a person of reasonably firm character (see p 1112 h, post). Per Lord Reid. It is enough if the circumstances are such that ordinary people like those present would have been terrified; if people were present it is not necessary to prove by their evidence that they were frightened (see p 1114 h, post).

Semble. Where a fight takes place in a private place it is necessary for the prosecution, in order to prove an affray, to establish the presence of bystanders who could have been frightened by the sight or sound of what was occurring. Sed quaere, whether it is necessary to prove the presence of bystanders where the fight takes place in a public place (see p 1113 a to c and p 1114 j to p 1115 a, post).

Quaere. Whether a display of force without actual violence is capable of constituting an affray even though the element of terror is present (see p 1112 d and e, post).

Appeal

The appellant, Vincent Taylor, appealed against the order of the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division¹, (Karminski LJ, O'Connor and Forbes JJ) dated 9th October 1972 dismissing his appeal against his conviction of affray on 21st March 1972 in the Crown Court at Nottingham before Phillips J and a jury. The Court of Appeal certified that a point of law of general public importance was involved, namely, 'Whether a person commits the offence of affray if he alone is unlawfully fighting to the terror of other persons'. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC.

Basil Wigoder QC and W H Joss for the appellant.
Charles McCullough QC and J B M Milmo for the Crown.

4th July. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC. My Lords, on 21st August 1971 a fight took place at the Strelley Social Club in the city of Nottingham. Tables were overturned. Beer was thrown all over the place. Some of the spectators were screaming and plainly frightened. Among those fighting were the appellant, Taylor, whose name was originally Lowndes, two police officers, who had come to the club to arrest the appellant, and the appellant's two brothers, David and Michael Lowndes.

All three brothers were subsequently tried at the Nottingham Crown Court. The indictment contained a number of counts of which the only one relevant to this appeal was making an affray. The defence of each of the three brothers was self-defence. This, if made good, is a good defence to a charge of affray (see *R v Sharp, R v Johnson*²). There were two trials. At the first, one brother was acquitted, but the jury failed to agree as to the other two, one of whom was the appellant. At the second trial, another brother was acquitted, but, by a majority of ten to two, the jury convicted the appellant. The question then arose whether this conviction could stand in the light of the two acquittals. In other words, can a man be guilty of making an affray if, though others be fighting, he alone is fighting unlawfully to the terror of other persons?

The Court of Appeal¹ (Karminski LJ, O'Connor and Forbes JJ) answered the question affirmatively and dismissed the appeal against conviction. They certified that a question of general public importance was involved, but refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords. Leave was subsequently given by the appeal committee. Thus, the question comes before your Lordships' House.

Only one other factual element in the case needs to be mentioned. After dismissing the appeal against conviction, the Court of Appeal went on to allow an appeal against sentence, reducing an original sentence of three years' imprisonment to one of nine months. In doing so, they explained that they proceeded partly on the basis that the two acquitted brothers had largely instigated the fight, and partly on the basis that, in the light of the defence of self-defence, and the two acquittals, the conviction of the appellant must be taken as meaning that the appellant had started by lawfully defending himself, but ended by using too much force.

The offence of affray is a very ancient common law misdemeanour for which the penalties are at large. The offence has been brought into extensive use, after a long period of relative desuetude, only since the end of the last war and, since *Button v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹ when your Lordships' House removed the supposed limitation that to be guilty of affray the fighting must occur in a public place, indictments for affray have been successfully brought in respect of fights in private premises of various kinds.

From the first, as was conceded by counsel for the appellant, at least in one class of case, the offence of affray could be committed by a single person, namely, that mentioned in the Statute of Northampton 1328². This statute, however, seems to have been largely declaratory of the common law, but prescriptive of an additional remedy. It forbids amongst other things the carrying or brandishing in public of unusual or terrifying weapons. The Statute of Northampton was relied on to sustain an indictment as recently as 1903 (see *R v Meade*³). The statute itself has been repealed as obsolete or unnecessary by the Criminal Law Act 1967, no doubt partly as the result of the enactment of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953. But, whether or not this example of the common law offence of affray still lives on, the fact that the crime of affray could be committed by a single person at least in this class of case is not without its importance in determining the result of the present appeal. Counsel for the appellant was fain to argue that this class of affray was a separate species, and could be ignored for the purpose of deciding the ingredients necessary to constitute the commoner form in which the offence occurs as the result of a fight between two or more contestants. But, for reasons which will emerge, I do not think it possible to treat it as a totally separate offence in this way.

The classical definition of affray repeated, though not always in precisely the same language, over and over again in the older textbooks was that it was fighting by two or more persons [in some public place] to the terror of the King's subjects⁴ and with the omission of the words in square brackets which he demonstrated to have been added as the result of an error, Lord Gardiner LC adopted this definition in *Button v Director of Public Prosecutions*⁵ when he said: 'The essence of the offence is that two or more fight together to the terror of the Queen's subjects.'

On this, and on some observations of Lord Goddard CJ in *Sharp*⁶ to the effect that affray was essentially a joint offence, counsel for the appellant largely founded his submission which was to the effect that a party could only be guilty of the offence if not only he, but at least some other, was guilty of fighting unlawfully.

As the Court of Appeal⁷ pointed out, this submission cannot live consistently with the decisions in *R v Scarrow*⁸ or *R v Summers*⁹ from which it appears fairly clearly, if they are to be supported, that a person is not to be acquitted of affray simply because his victim acts lawfully, as for instance by retreating, or simply warding off the blows aimed at him by the accused. I cannot myself see how, if this is so, it can fail to follow that if his opponent is actually fighting, but fighting lawfully, for instance, in self-defence or to effect a lawful arrest or rescue, an accused person indulging in unlawful violence against that opponent may be guilty of making an affray. Indeed, at one moment in *Scarrow*¹⁰ Lord Parker CJ is reported as saying in terms:

b That case was expressly followed by Edmund Davies LJ in *Summers*¹, and by O'Connor J in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal² in the instant case. I am certain that they were right, and, though I endorse the actual decision in *Sharp*³ to the effect that self-defence is an answer to a charge of affray, I am quite certain that the two passages in Lord Goddard CJ's judgment in that case⁴ to the effect that affray 'is of necessity a joint offence' and that if a man is 'only defending himself . . . that is not a fight and, consequently, not an affray' cannot be supported and do not represent an accurate statement of the law. It is, of course, true that before an affray of the type which consists in a fight can take place at least two persons must be present, but it does not follow from that that each of them is guilty of the affray. Making an affray consists in the unlawful participation in the fight, and one may be participating unlawfully when others are participating lawfully. If this were not so the most ludicrous results would follow. In the first place, it must follow that to prosecute one of a number of defendants to conviction, it would be necessary for the prosecution, in addition to excluding the possibility of a defence of self-defence in the defendant himself would also have to exclude the possibility of such a defence in at least one of his co-defendants. Counsel for the appellant conceded that if two assailants attacked one or more victims who did not retaliate, the offence of affray was complete, but he was driven to argue that if one man had attacked the same victims he would have been innocent of affray, though if one of these victims defended himself with slightly more force than was necessary, the first man became once again guilty of affray. Counsel for the Crown supposed an even more extravagant case. A man runs through the street, waving a sword and terrifying the people, but threatening no particular person. He is guilty of affray because he is brandishing a weapon. He points it at an individual. He ceases to be guilty because there is no fight. The victim defends himself, but uses no more force than is necessary. The assailant remains innocent because there is only one person acting unlawfully. The victim then uses more force than is necessary. The assailant becomes once more guilty of affray because he is no longer alone in fighting unlawfully. The fact is that affray consists in participating unlawfully in a violent breach of the peace to the terror of the lieges. There is no reason in logic or law to enquire whether other participants in the fight are acting lawfully or unlawfully.

g It would, therefore, be enough for me to say in this case that, save for a minor doubt, which I expressed in argument, as to the justice of one comment on *Hawkins*⁵, I agree entirely with the judgment of the Court of Appeal² with the judgments in *Scarrow*⁶ and *Summers*¹ on which it was founded. We were, however, invited by counsel on both sides to discuss more widely the offence of affray and though, in the main, and for reasons which I will develop, I do not think it right to accede to this invitation some account of the way in which the arguments were presented and the extent to which they were found acceptable is, I think, desirable.

h Both counsel drew out attention to the definition of affray in *Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law*⁷ as it was expressly approved in *Summers*¹ and again by the Court of Appeal² in the instant case. This definition is as follows:

- j 1 (1972) 56 Cr App Rep 604
 3 [1957] 1 All ER 577, [1957] 1 QB 552

 7 3rd Edn (1973), p 615

'Affray is a common law misdemeanour which, after a long period of desuetude, has not only been brought back into regular use, but greatly expanded in scope by judicial decision. Its elements are (1) fighting by one or more persons: or a display of force by one or more persons without actual violence; (2) in such a manner that reasonable people might be frightened or intimidated.'

This definition was followed by Edmund Davies LJ in *Summers*¹ and O'Connor J² in the present case. I would, however, issue a word of caution lest those who use this definition seek to find verbal inspiration in the actual language in which it happens to be couched.

Thus, in the first place, the word 'fight' needs to be interpreted so as to show that it is not necessary to prove a reciprocity of blows. Without attempting an alternative definition, it must include at least any unlawful participation in a violent breach of the peace where the requisite element of terror is achieved. The typical affray is, of course, a mêlée between many participants in which many blows are given and received by the participants. But the violence can be all on one side, and the unlawful character of the violence can be limited to one participant in the mêlée.

Secondly, the extent to which the 'display of force . . . without actual violence' constitutes the offence of affray even where the element of terror is present is still not wholly clear. It seems that the brandishing of a fearful weapon does constitute the offence, and has always done so, though in most cases where this is done by an individual, a charge under the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 would now seem preferable. From the older authorities it seems plain enough that mere words, unaccompanied by the brandishing of a weapon or actual violence, are not enough. But all sorts of things are, arguably, a display of force. I am anxious that nothing in this case should be construed as necessarily implying that anything less than an unlawful participation in a violent breach of the peace will be enough to satisfy the requirement. We were invited to consider demonstrations of all kinds, whether in the course of an industrial dispute or some politically motivated procession. It seems to me that there is nothing in the instant case, where all the ingredients of the offence save one were plainly present, to compel us to lay down the law in such a fashion as to extend the definition beyond what the strict circumstances of the case require.

Thirdly, the element of terror required by the second branch of the definition in the passage from *Smith and Hogan*³ requires further commentary and must not be weakened. From the very earliest days the offence of affray has required this element, and all the early textbooks stress the derivation of the word from the French 'effrayer', to put in terror. Thus in *Button*⁴ Lord Gardiner LC says in distinguishing, as the earlier authorities had done, affray from assault:

'... in each case the wrongful act is the same yet the mischief of the act falls on the victim in the offence of assault but on the bystander in the offence of affray.'

To my mind, it is essential to stress that the degree of violence required to constitute the offence of affray must be such as to be calculated to terrify a person of reasonably firm character. This should not be watered down.

Thus, it is arguable that the phrase 'might be frightened or intimidated' may be too weak. The violence must be such as to be calculated to terrify (that is, might reasonably be expected to terrify) not simply such as might terrify a person of the requisite degree of firmness.

We were invited to express an opinion as to the extent to which persons must be proved to have been present in order to satisfy the ingredient of terror. I do not

- a think that, on the facts of the present case, where many persons were in fact present and some were in fact terrified, it is desirable to explore this in depth. It is possible that where the fight takes place in a public street it is not necessary to prove the actual presence of bystanders, or persons within earshot or that they were actually terrified. It may be enough to show that the violence used was of such a kind as to render the street unusable by persons of reasonable firmness by reason of the terror it was liable to cause.
- b I am not, for example, prepared to say that a fight between rival gangs on the front of a seaside resort, or a duel with lethal weapons on Putney Heath, would not be an affray if the prosecution failed to establish the presence of bystanders or their actual terror. But in a private place it would be surprising if affray could be complete without the actual presence of onlookers or audience to be frightened by the sight or sound of what was occurring. This must clearly be considered of importance since the decision in *Button*¹. These are matters which must be canvassed in the light of cases where the facts are such as to raise the issues. In the present instance, it is enough to say that, subject to my comments above, I agree with the Court of Appeal² and consider that the cases of *Scarrow*³ and *Summer*⁴ were rightly decided, and that the observations of Lord Goddard CJ in *Sharp*⁵ are not correct. In my view, the question certified as of general public importance should be answered in the affirmative, and the appeal itself should be dismissed.

LORD REID. My Lords, the point of law certified in this case as being of general public importance is:

- e 'Whether a person commits the offence of affray if he alone is unlawfully fighting to the terror of other persons.'

That may seem to be a short and simple question but it cannot be answered without enquiring into the nature and history of the offence of affray. This offence has a long history going back at least 600 years. From the outset it has been clear that two elements are necessary. There must be violence done or immediately apprehended. And that violence must be such as to create terror.

- f Until very recently there was practically no judicial authority but the offence is dealt with in every textbook, at least since 1593. The industry of counsel produced more than a dozen of some antiquity and authority. The earlier writers did not try to define the offence: they devoted more space to the rights and duties of constables and private citizens in dealing with an affray when it broke out. My impression is that any violent disturbance of the peace was regarded as an affray if it took place in such circumstances as to cause terror to the King's subjects. There was no need to confine the offence within narrower limits and I find nothing in the early books to suggest that the scope of the offence was more limited.

- g For some reason which I have not discovered there were few prosecutions for this offence for a very long period before the middle of this century. But then the practical advantages to the prosecution of using this offence must have occurred to somebody. h I understand that in recent years it has proved to be a valuable weapon for dealing with the rising tide of violent crime.

- j Generally the offence was committed by several wrongdoers fighting each other in a street or other public place. So there crept into some of the textbooks suggestions that the offence could only be committed in a public place and could only be committed by two or more persons fighting together. No reasons for this were given.

The first of these misapprehensions was corrected by this House in *Button v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹. We have now to deal with the second. a

One form of the offence consists of brandishing offensive weapons to the terror of the King's subjects. There is no suggestion that there need be more than one wrongdoer in that case. This form of the offence was dealt with in the Statute of Northampton 1328². That statute has now been repealed but it seems to be generally agreed that it did not supersede the common law and that the common law offence still survives. If this form of the offence may be committed by one person acting alone, one would expect to find some special reason to justify a conclusion that other forms of the offence can only be committed by two or more persons. b

The only possible justification that I can see would be if the offence must be limited to two or more persons unlawfully fighting each other. There is no binding authority, requiring us so to limit the offence. Why should it be so limited? Such a limitation would exclude two cases both of which can be just as terrifying. In the first place, one of the combatants may be lawfully acting in self-defence. The fight may be just as real a fight and just as terrifying as if both combatants were wrongdoers. Onlookers will fear that if the unlawful assailant wins he will attack them. And, secondly, one or more violent men may attack innocent and peaceful people and none of them may resist. Why are the assailants to escape punishment because their victims cannot or do not retaliate? Any such limitation would be quite illogical and I can see no justification for it. c

The second of these points was dealt with by the Court of Appeal in *R v Scarrow*³ where it was held that there need not be 'reciprocal violence'. Three men went into an hotel and, as a witness said, 'They were fighting everyone, young and old, punching, kicking and no one retaliated'. They were, in my judgment, rightly held guilty of affray. If three men can be guilty in such circumstances, why not one alone? It had never been suggested that any element of common purpose is essential to constitute an affray. d

The only real difficulty in the present case arises from observations in *R v Sharp*⁴. The main question in that case was whether fighting in self-defence was a good defence to a charge of affray. The court rightly held that it was. But then the question was whether the other party to the fight could be convicted alone. I do not think that this question was properly argued. Counsel is reported⁵ as having said, '... it is conceded that [self-defence] could be a good defence. It would mean there was no fight ...' That seems to me to be a complete non sequitur. A man is entitled to fight strenuously in self-defence if he is in serious danger. e

But this view seems to have been accepted by the court and it was said that affray 'is of necessity a joint offence'. I can see no justification at all for that. If no element of common purpose is required and there is no need for 'reciprocal violence' in what sense could it be a joint offence? In my view, we should make it clear that that part of the judgment in Sharp's case⁴ is wrong. f

The question of terror does not arise in this case but as it was much referred to in argument and is an essential element in the offence, I think that I must say a word about it. Undoubtedly if people are present it is not necessary to prove by their evidence that they were terrified. It is enough if the circumstances are such that ordinary people like them would have been terrified. I say 'would' not 'might' have been. But I am much more doubtful about suggestions in some cases that no one but the combatants need be present at all or even within earshot: that it is enough that if someone had been present he would have been terrified. As terror is an essential ingredient of the offence I think that there can be no difference in principle g a between violence in a public or a private place. But that is a matter which can be decided when it arises.

I would not seek a rigid definition of a common law offence; that would be an attempt to codify the law piecemeal. If a new point arises the question should always be whether it is within the mischief aimed at and within the principles established by the authorities.

b I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, the hearing of this appeal will have served a valuable purpose if certain doubts in regard to the common law offence of affray are removed. Unhappily in these days prosecutions for offences against the public peace are numerous. It has in recent years often been necessary and desirable to frame indictments for an affray. It will generally be the case that several persons will be accused. But the situation that has given rise to the present appeal may not prove to be exceptional. At the trial of three men on a charge of affray one was acquitted and the jury were unable to agree as to the other two. On the retrial of the two, one of these was acquitted and the other, the present appellant, was convicted. The learned trial judge certified (under s 1 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968) that there was a fit case for appeal on the question whether, the one having been acquitted, the appellant could properly be convicted of affray. The allegation against the two was that they fought police officers who were questioning the appellant about another offence. It was not alleged that any other persons fought the police officers. The particulars of offence merely set out that the two men 'on the 21st day of August 1971 in the City of Nottingham unlawfully fought and made an affray.'

So on appeal to the Court of Appeal¹, and on appeal from that court, the question has been debated, which is neatly expressed in the point certified by the Court of Appeal as being of general public importance, namely, whether a person commits the offence of affray if he alone is unlawfully fighting to the terror of other persons.

f In the question raised the word 'unlawfully' is of importance. On a first approach the question might be asked: but how can one man alone fight? The answer is that of course one man who is fighting must be fighting or attacking some other person, but it does not follow that such other person becomes engaged in reciprocal fighting; he may not resist at all or, if he does resist and fights back, he may only be reasonably and necessarily defending himself. The fighting that may constitute an affray must be unlawful fighting and one who is only legitimately defending himself will not be guilty of an affray (*R v Sharp*²).

g But it is said that those authoritative writers who over many centuries have described the offence of affray have used such words as 'the fighting of two or more persons' as well as the words 'to the terror of His Majesty's subjects'. In the argument for the appellant there was an insistence that the offence can only be committed by at least two persons. Your Lordships were helpfully referred in sequence of dates to numerous passages from the works of well-known writers. Many of the passages had been mentioned in the arguments addressed to the Court of Criminal Appeal and thereafter to this House in *Button v Director of Public Prosecutions*³ and many were referred to in the speech of Lord Gardiner LC. In that case the previously prevailing error that there could only be a conviction for affray if fighting to the terror of the Queen's subjects was in a public place was corrected. It was said⁴ that the essence of the offence of affray 'is that two or more fight together to the terror of the Queen's subjects'. It is important to remember that the question then being considered was whether an affray could be other than in a public place. It was not necessary, therefore, to consider the succinct point as now certified by the Court of Appeal¹ or to be specific as to what is meant or as to what may be the result if it is said that two people 'fight together'. Nor did the various writers, who often adhered with a certain measure of fidelity to phrases previously hallowed by usage, have occasion to consider the point now certified. It is essential, therefore, now to make it clear that while there may be circumstances warranting a conviction for affray of each one of two people who are fighting together to the terror of the Queen's subjects there may be a conviction of one only of the two if the other, though apparently fighting, is in no sense fighting unlawfully but is endeavouring not to fight or is only fighting in legitimate self-defence. The need to make this clear is shown by the fact that in *R v Sharp*² where there had been fighting between those two accused persons it was said that affray 'is of necessity a joint offence' and further that it was obvious 'that one cannot be convicted and the other acquitted'. Those expressions of opinion were based on the view that if one man attacks another who merely defends himself then there is no fight. It was said that if two men are found fighting in a street one of them must be entitled to say that the other attacked him and that he was only defending himself. 'If he was only defending himself and not attacking that is not a fight and consequently not an affray'. But if two men are seen to be 'fighting in a street' with the result that terror is caused to the Queen's subjects and if it has all come about because one is an aggressor while the other was merely defending himself I see no reason why the aggressor should be immune from conviction for affray. Those who see the fighting may have no means of deciding how it came about or whose fault it was. They may not be able to appreciate that one man is merely defending himself and doing his best to disengage. The terror and alarm caused to them by the fighting will not be any the less because the fact may be that one man of the two was only of necessity engaged in the fighting.

To such effect was the opinion of Lord Parker CJ when in *R v Scarrow*³ he said:

'It may well be that if two people fight and one is acting in self-defence that man cannot be said to be guilty of an affray, but it would appear to this court that there is no reason why his attacker, whether acting alone or jointly with another attacker, should not be held guilty of the affray.'

The view so expressed seems to me to be both reasonable and logical. It was accepted and followed in *R v Summers*⁴. I see no sound basis for the contention that there must be at least two persons fighting unlawfully before there can be an affray. It is said that the disturbance of the peace assumes a new dimension when more than one person is involved. It is doubtless true that if many people are involved there is likely to be greater disturbance than if only two are involved. But if terror is in fact caused by fighting between two people I can see no logical reason why if one was only defending himself and if the fighting was all the fault of the other that very circumstance should relieve such other person of guilt.

I would give affirmative answer to the point of law as certified and, accordingly, would dismiss the appeal

The defendants failed to observe the covenant to repair. At the expiry of the lease they held over, remaining in possession. In 1967 the defendants' medical officer of health certified that the house was unfit for human habitation under s 4^a of the Housing Act 1957. In consequence the house was included in a slum clearance area order under s 42^b of the 1957 Act. A notice to treat and a notice of entry were served on 9th January 1970. The evidence showed that if the defendants had complied with the repairing covenants in the lease the premises would not have been declared unfit for human habitation and in consequence the house would either have been excluded from the clearance order or would have had a greatly enhanced value, being habitable and in good repair. In an action by the landlords for damages for breach of covenant the defendants claimed, however, that, by virtue of s 18 (1)^c of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover damages for the breach of covenant because it had been shown that at or shortly after the termination of the lease the house would be pulled down.

Held – (i) The plaintiffs had suffered damage by reason of the defendants' breach of covenant in that the value of their reversion had been diminished. The relevant provision of s 18 (1) had no application to the facts of the case since (i) it had not been shown that at or shortly after the termination of the lease, the house would be pulled down, and (ii) in any event s 18 (1) contemplated the lessor making a decision to pull down or so structurally alter the premises that any repairs necessary to comply with the lease would have been nugatory; it could not be construed as enabling a municipal corporation by its own failure to comply with the repairing covenant, so that the house had to be demolished, to claim relief in an action for damages for breach of covenant (see p 1121 h to p 1122 a and d, post).

(ii) It followed that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages assessed at the value of the reversion, if the repairing covenant had been complied with, on the date of the notice of entry, less the site value payable on the compulsory purchase (see p 1122 e and g, post).

Action

By a writ issued on 20th October 1971 the plaintiffs, Hibernian Property Co Ltd, brought an action against the defendants, Liverpool Corporation. By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that they were the owners in fee simple of premises in the city of Liverpool consisting of a dwelling-house known as 2 Uhlan Street, originally demised for a period of 75 years from 25th March 1873; by divers assignments the defendants had become entitled to the residue of the lease on 21st December 1908, and, on the expiry of the lease, had held over on the terms of the lease and remained in possession of the premises; under the terms of the lease the lessee covenanted at all times during the term to keep the buildings erected or standing on the premises and their respective appurtenances in good and tenantable repair and condition and at the end or sooner determination of the term to leave the premises in such repair and condition; in breach of that covenant the defendants had failed to keep or leave the premises in such repair or condition by reason whereof the plaintiffs had suffered loss and damage. The particulars alleged were as follows:

'In consequence of the defendants' aforesaid breaches of covenant the premises became unfit for human habitation within the meaning of the Housing Acts 1957-1969 and was so classified by the defendants. The said dwelling-house was accordingly included in a Clearance Area under section 42 of the Housing Act 1957 and was subsequently made the subject of a Compulsory Purchase Order under the said Act. The plaintiffs will accordingly receive compensation only on the basis of site value in the sum of approximately £135. But for the said classification the market value attributable as aforesaid of the said dwelling-house would have been approximately £1600. The plaintiffs accordingly compute their loss under this head at £1465.'

By their defence the defendants denied that they had failed to keep the buildings

- a* in good or tenantable repair or condition or failed to leave them in such repair and denied that they had committed the breaches of covenant alleged or that the plaintiffs had suffered loss or damage. Furthermore the defendants alleged that, if they were or had been in breach of any of the covenants alleged, the plaintiffs' reversion had not been diminished by reason of such breach. The defendants further alleged that the premises would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy, have
b been pulled down, in whatever state of repair they might have been, and stated that they would rely on the provisions of s 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927.

- c* 2nd April. CAULFIELD J read the following judgment. Subject to a compulsory purchase order to which I shall refer later, the plaintiffs are the owners in fee simple of a piece of land known as 2 Uhlan Street, Liverpool, together with the buildings erected thereon. The said land was, by a lease dated 17th February 1875, demised by the Earl of Sefton to William Knapman for a period of 75 years from 25th March 1873. By divers assignments, the defendants became entitled to the d residue of the lease on 21st December 1908. On the expiry of the lease by effluxion of time, the defendants held over on the terms thereof and remained in possession. By the lease, William Knapman, for himself and his successors in title, covenanted at all times during the term to keep all the buildings which then were or should thereafter be erected or standing on the demised premises and their respective appurtenances in good and tenantable repair and condition and at the end or sooner e determination of the said term to leave the same in such good repair and condition.

The plaintiffs allege that the defendants failed to keep the buildings in good or tenantable repair and, further, failed to leave the same in such repair on the determination either of the said term or of the tenancy created by the defendants holding over.

- f* On 14th February 1967 the medical officer of health of the defendants certified under s 42 of the Housing Act 1957 that a certain area of Toxteth Street—clearance area 196—contained houses which were unfit for human habitation. The premises, 2 Uhlan Street, were designated within that area. The necessary formalities followed this notice. A notice to treat and a notice of entry were served on 9th January 1970. The plaintiffs served a schedule of dilapidations on 19th May 1970.

- g* The plaintiffs' case is that the defendants, in breach of the repairing covenants, allowed the premises to reach such a state that they were declared unfit for human habitation. Because of this unfitness, the premises came to be included in the Toxteth Street clearance area. This designation resulted in compensation being restricted to the site value. The plaintiffs contend that if there had been compliance by the defendants with the covenants the house would not have been so designated and would either have remained as a dwelling-house—that is, would have been
h excluded from the clearance area—or, if included, the site and premises would have had an increased value.

I refer to s 42 (1) of the Housing Act 1957. That section is related to s 4. Section 42 (1) reads:

- i* 'Where a local authority, upon consideration of an official representation or other information in their possession, are satisfied as respects any area in their district—(a) that the houses in that area are unfit for human habitation, or are by reason of their bad arrangement, or the narrowness or bad arrangement of the streets, dangerous or injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the area, and that the other buildings, if any, in the area are for a like reason, dangerous or injurious to the health of the said inhabitants; and (b) that the most satisfactory method of dealing with the conditions in the area is the demolition of all the buildings in the area, the authority shall cause that area to be defined on a map in such manner as to exclude from the area any building which is not unfit for human habitation or dangerous or injurious to health and shall pass a resolution declaring the area so defined to be a clearance area, that is to say, an area to be cleared of all buildings in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this Part of this Act . . .

Section 4 (1) reads:

'In determining for any of the purposes of this Act whether a house is unfit for human habitation, regard shall be had to its condition in respect of the following matters that is to say—(a) repair; (b) stability; (c) freedom from damp; (cc) internal arrangement; (d) natural lighting; (e) ventilation; (f) water supply; (g) drainage and sanitary conveniences; (h) facilities for preparation and cooking of food and for the disposal of waste water; and the house shall be deemed to be unfit for human habitation if and only if it is so far defective in one or more of the said matters that it is not reasonably suitable for occupation in that condition.'

The defendants say that because they intend to demolish the premises this claim is defeated by the terms of s 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927 which, so far as it is material, reads:

'Damages for a breach of a covenant or agreement to keep or put premises in repair during the currency of a lease, or to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, whether such covenant or agreement is expressed or implied, and whether general or specific, shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid . . .'

Then comes the part of the section most material to this judgment:

' . . . and in particular no damages shall be recovered for a breach of any such covenant or agreement to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, if it is shown that the premises, in whatever state of repair they might be, would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant or agreement.'

The defendants therefore say that no sum is payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs, assuming breaches, other than site value. Secondly, say the defendants, on the facts, however well they had maintained the property, it would still have been designated as unfit for human habitation and if that be the true position the plaintiffs are only entitled to an agreed figure of £135—the site value.

I should now, before dealing with the law, find the facts. The defendants called no evidence. The plaintiffs called two very reputable surveyors, Mr Haig and Mr Sutcliffe. I accept their evidence; indeed, I have no option but to accept it. I need not detail the evidence of Mr Haig, who inspected the unoccupied premises in order to prepare a schedule of dilapidations. I accept his opinions based on his inspection. These opinions were that, if repairs had been carried out in accordance with his specification, the premises would have been fit for human habitation, and further that it would have been a business proposition to have restored the property to a habitable state as required by the lease. I accept, too, the opinions of Mr Sutcliffe.

It follows from these findings that, if the defendants had complied with the covenants in the lease, the premises would probably not have been declared unfit for human habitation in respect of any of the matters set out in s 4 of the Housing Act 1957. I bear well in mind the submission of counsel for the defendants on the facts that the matters, freedom from damp, natural lighting and facilities for food storage, a are not matters within the repairing covenants and, equally, I can conceive the medical officer of health condemning the house as being unfit for human habitation solely on account of these matters.

Mr Haig dealt in precise terms with the question of dampness, lighting and storage. In particular, Mr Haig said that, although the property was built without a damp course and there was some rising dampness, yet it was not substantial and, given adequate maintenance, the absence of a damp course by itself would not have made the property damp. There were other factors, he continued, which contributed to the degree of dampness, such as the non-occupation of the premises, entry of rain due to disrepair and lack of heating. A prudent householder, he said, would reinstate the defective plaster with sound plaster in which there would be included a waterproofing additive at no substantial cost, a precaution commonly and successfully taken in Liverpool.

c The inadequate lighting and food storage matters were also covered by Mr Haig. Further, it may well be that this property could have been included in the clearance area by reason only of the bad arrangement or narrowness of the street, but, no evidence having been called by the defendants, I should not speculate.

d By my fact findings, I am finding that compliance with the covenant to repair would have resulted either in the property being excluded from the clearance area or in its having a greatly enhanced value because it would have been habitable and in good repair.

e There is a further finding of fact necessary. The defendants served a notice to treat on 9th January 1970 and, on the same day, a notice of intention to enter. It seems to me that nothing happened after that date and the defendants continued to pay rent. Indeed, it is agreed that rent has been paid up to the March quarter day of this year, 1973. No attempt was made at valuation, save for the site value, which was made about ten days before the trial.

f In the light of the findings of fact, I set out the problem of law. This property is condemned by the defendants' own medical officer of health as being unfit for human habitation. The defendants, the lessees and while they are holding over as lessees, are, in my judgment, in breach of their covenant to repair. While the defendants are still holding over, the house is condemned as being unfit for human habitation. The property is included in a clearance area. The necessary formalities are followed and the lessees then, under statute, seek to purchase compulsorily.

g I may be stating too simply the situation as I see it, but, in effect, I think that this is a case where a lessee fails to comply with his covenant to repair, there is indeed continuing breach and, while he is still a lessee, he concludes by reason, on my findings of his own breaches of covenant that the house should be demolished and then proceeds to purchase compulsorily, contending that the purchase price to him should only be site value.

h I come now to deal with the law. I think that the proper test is to define the extent to which the value of the lessor's reversion has been diminished. If the lessor intends to demolish the premises, there is no damage to the reversion. The most common example is that of the landlord who intends to demolish at the expiration of a lease and then to re-erect. The second part of s 18 beginning with the words 'in particular' is not expressed to apply to breaches of a repairing covenant during the currency of the lease. In any event, on my findings of fact, I do not think that the second part of s 18 is applicable to the facts of this case.

i My first reason is that, on the facts, it has not been shown that these premises would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down. Secondly, the last part of s 18 (1) certainly, I think, contemplates the lessor making a decision to pull down or so structurally alter the premises that any repairs that would be shown to be necessary to achieve compliance with the covenants in the lease would be rendered nugatory. I do not, however, think that the section is even capable of being construed as enabling a municipal corporation, by its own failure to comply with covenants to repair so that the house has to be demolished, to contend that the second part gives it relief in a claim for damages for breach of covenant. a

This is my view, whether the plaintiffs' claim is deemed to be made during the currency of the lease or at its termination. If I am wrong, it would, I think, mean that whenever a corporation was a lessee of property with an obligation to keep the property in repair, it could well find it more profitable to fail to comply with its contractual obligations than to discharge them. This, to my mind, does not make sense and I do not think that it is the law. I am fortified in this view because, if the corporation is satisfied that a certain area should be classified as a clearance area under s 42, it has a statutory duty to exclude from that area any building which is not unfit for human habitation. Obviously, in such a case the compensation to the owner of the property is much greater than site value. b

Can it be the law that a local authority can allow property of which it is the lessee to fall into disrepair in breach of its own covenant, then, having gone through the formalities of compulsory purchase, pay only site value? I do not think that it can be. As I see it, the corporation would be rewarding itself for its breach of its own obligation. c

I therefore conclude that there was damage to the reversion in this case and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages. The final question is to determine the date in reference to which the damages fall to be assessed. d

Certain figures have been agreed for two different dates. If the correct date is the date of the notice to treat—namely, 9th January 1970—the figure is £1,600 less the site value of £135. If the date is the date of trial, it is £2,100 less £135. On this question, I was referred to *Birmingham City Corp'n v West Midland Baptist (Trust) Association (Inc)*¹. The plaintiffs argue that nothing happened after the notices to treat and to enter were served. As far as I can see, that is right. Nothing did happen except that the defendants continued to pay rent. e

Counsel for the defendants emphasised that the plaintiffs averred in para 5 of the claim that the defendants' tenancy terminated with the making of the compulsory purchase order. The defendants in their defence so admitted. Counsel for the defendants argued that the proper date was the date of the notice of entry. It is conceded by the plaintiffs that all the formalities that should follow the making of a compulsory purchase order have been properly followed by the defendants. The procedure is that, after the making of a compulsory purchase order, the Minister has to confirm that order. Thereafter, the notice to treat is served. f

In my judgment, the notice to treat does not alter the relationship of the parties, but the notice of entry does. I think that the date on which damages should be assessed is the date of the notice of entry. It so happens that the notice of entry accompanied the notice to treat. The date of the notice of entry is 9th January 1970. Accordingly, on the agreed figures, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the sum of £1,465 and there will be judgment accordingly. g

I shall award interest at the rate of six per cent from 9th January 1970 and there will be judgment accordingly. The plaintiffs are to have their costs. h

RUSSELL, JAMES LJJ AND PLOWMAN J

5th, 6th APRIL 1973

Public health – Sewerage – Provision of public sewers – Local authority – Power to construct sewer ‘in, on or over’ land on giving reasonable notice – Land – Proposal by local authority to construct sewer through site of plaintiffs’ bungalow – Construction of sewer involving demolition of bungalow – Whether ‘land’ including buildings – Whether authority entitled to demolish building in order to construct sewer – Interpretation Act 1889, s 3 – Public Health Act 1936, s 15 (1).

Public health – Sewerage – Provision of public sewers – Public sewer – Meaning – Pipe constructed to receive flood water from river – Pipe also constructed to drain surface water from buildings and road surfaces – Whether pipe a public sewer – Public Health Act 1936, s 15 (1).

A river which ran through an urban district had in the past proved inadequate to carry away surface water with the result that there had been serious flooding. In order to remedy the situation the district council proposed to construct a large pipe designed to receive, at times of high flood, direct from the river a certain amount of its flood water and also to drain surface water from houses, shops, offices etc, as well as from several miles of road, which would otherwise have found its way into the river. The proposed course of the pipe ran directly through the plaintiffs’ bungalow. It was common ground that the construction of the proposed pipe would necessarily involve the demolition of the bungalow. The plaintiffs claimed that the power conferred on the council by s 15 (1) (i) (b)^a of the Public Health Act 1936 to construct a public sewer ‘in, on or over any land not forming part of a street, after giving reasonable notice’, did not include the power to demolish buildings and that, in any event, the proposed pipe was not a ‘public sewer’ within the meaning of s 15 (1) (i).

Held – (i) By virtue of s 3^b of the Interpretation Act 1889 the word ‘land’ in s 15 (1) (i) (b) of the 1936 Act included ‘buildings’ since no intention appeared to the contrary. Accordingly s 15 (1) (i) (b) empowered the council to construct a public sewer in, on or over land, including houses or buildings (see p 1126 e, p 1128 j and p 1130 c e and g, post).

(ii) The power to construct a sewer conferred by s 15 (1) (i) (b) necessarily included a power to do that which was inescapable if the power was to be exercised. Since the demolition of the plaintiffs’ bungalow was inevitable if the sewer was to be constructed on the proposed line, the power to construct the sewer conferred by s 15 (1) (i) (b) included the power to demolish the bungalow (see p 1129 b to d and p 1130 c and e, post).

(iii) The proposed pipe was a ‘public sewer’ within s 15 (1) (i) of the 1936 Act. Even if two of the three proposed functions of the sewer would not themselves qualify the pipe as a public sewer the fact that the third proposed function, i.e. the drainage of surface water from buildings, did so, was sufficient (see p 1129 j and p 1130 a c and e, post).

(iv) It followed therefore that, on complying with the relevant statutory requirements as to notice and compensation, the council had power to demolish the plaintiffs’ bungalow for the purpose of constructing the proposed sewer.

Decision of Megarry J [1972] 3 All ER 504 reversed.

Appeal

By a writ issued on 24th April 1972 the plaintiffs, Marjorie Gaynor Hutton and John Clifford Holtby, brought an action against the Esher Urban District Council ('the council') seeking various declarations and injunctions. By notice of motion dated 24th April 1972 the plaintiffs sought (1) an order that the council, whether by themselves, their servants, agents, contractors or any of them or otherwise howsoever, be restrained by injunction until judgment in the action or further order from entering on the land and premises of the plaintiffs known as 43 Queen's Drive, Thames Ditton, Surrey, pursuant to notices dated 30th March 1972 served on each of the plaintiffs by the council and alleged by the council to be pursuant to s 15 of the Public Health Act 1936; (2) an order that the council, whether by themselves, their servants, agents, contractors or any of them or otherwise howsoever, be restrained by injunction until judgment in the action or further order from pulling down, demolishing or removing the structure or any part thereof of the buildings erected on the land of the plaintiffs at 43 Queen's Drive, Thames Ditton, pursuant to the notices dated 30th March 1972 served on each of the plaintiffs by the council and alleged by the council to be pursuant to s 15 of the Public Health Act 1936. On 8th May 1972, on the parties agreeing to treat the hearing of the motion as the trial of the action and on the court accepting undertakings by the council in lieu of injunctions, Megarry J¹ declared (i) that the council had no power to enter on the plaintiffs' bungalow situate at and known as 43 Queen's Drive, Thames Ditton, pursuant to the notices served by the council on the plaintiffs and (ii) that the council had no power under s 15 of the 1936 Act to pull down, demolish or remove the structure or any part thereof of the buildings erected on the plaintiffs' land. The council appealed. By a respondents' notice the plaintiffs sought to uphold the judgment of Megarry J on the additional ground that what was proposed to be constructed by the council was not a public sewer but a river re-routing scheme or land drainage improvement scheme commonly known as the River Rythe improvement scheme. The facts are set out in the judgment of Russell LJ. c

RUSSELL LJ. This is an appeal from a decision of Megarry J¹. He decided, on a motion for interlocutory relief, that the appellant district council was not entitled, for the purpose of constructing a public surface water sewer in fulfilment of its duty of providing such public sewers as might be necessary for effectually draining its district, to demolish the plaintiffs' bungalow, under s 15 of the Public Health Act 1936. The duty that I have referred to arises under s 14 of that Act. h

The River Rythe flows in a generally northern direction under the Kingston by-pass, near where it joins the Esher-Portsmouth road, to join the River Thames a short distance east of the plaintiffs' bungalow which is bordered by the Thames. i a Due in large measure no doubt to the increase in built-over areas, and in part I dare say to the increase in road surface areas in the district, the river has proved inadequate in the past to carry away the surface water to the Thames and there has in the past been quite serious flooding. Now the district council wants to try to remedy this. Their proposal involves the construction of a large pipe which is designed in a sense to achieve two things: first of all (and I do not put them in order of importance), at times of high flood, to receive direct from the River Rythe a certain amount of its flood water and also to receive from built-up areas and street areas surface water which would otherwise have found its way into the river. The scheme might be described as the provision of a second water route in relief of the river from two points of view, one in times of flood taking water direct from the river, and the other preventing surface water, which would otherwise contribute to the floods, reaching the river.

b Now, the council, acting on the advice of their experts, decided on the layout as being what is (in, I believe, modern jargon) the best on a cost-benefit analysis. Unfortunately, that proposed layout brings the proposed sewer at the end under a street which points substantially straight at the plaintiffs' bungalow and thereafter, for its few remaining yards, straight through the plaintiffs' bungalow to the outfall proposed in the Thames at the plaintiffs' river frontage. It is common ground that if this operation is carried out it necessarily involves, having regard to the size of the pipe and the size of the bungalow, the demolition of the plaintiffs' bungalow.

c Now, I should remark at once that if this is permissible, the plaintiffs will be entitled, under s 278 of the Public Health Act 1936, to full compensation for any damage or loss sustained by them. The plaintiffs will not lose financially. If the course that is proposed under s 15 is not permissible, then if the district council want to carry through this matter, it would seem that it would be necessary for them to seek a compulsory purchase order, involving no doubt a public inquiry. In truth, that is really what the plaintiffs are aiming at. They think that the route chosen is not the best one, in any sense of the word 'best', and they wish to seek to persuade an inspector or a Ministry of that fact, having failed so to persuade the council. Whether they are right in their view as to what is the best, or whether the council is right in its view as to what is the best, is of course not the concern of this court on this appeal.

d Now, initially, the council described the scheme as a scheme to re-route the River Rythe, or a River Rythe improvement scheme; I forget the exact phrase. The council hoped that, if they carried it through as a land drainage project, they would get a government grant of up to 50 per cent of the cost, a cost somewhere between half a million and a million pounds. I state that broad bracket because I cannot at the moment remember the figure. But, unfortunately, the central government refused this grant, and the local authority—the council—were then faced with this situation, if they wanted to carry through the operation. If they purported to do it exercising what might be conveniently labelled 'land drainage powers', they could only borrow money for it within a permitted and limited ceiling of borrowing for a group of projects within what is known as the locally determined sector. They did not want to do this, because it would restrict borrowing powers for other projects within that sector, and indeed we were told that the necessary borrowing would have been impossible, in terms of quantum, within the ceiling for that sector. But if special borrowing approval could be obtained from the government for the scheme as a sewerage scheme within the Public Health Act 1936, that would be within what is known as the key sector, and the problem of the ceiling on borrowing would be solved. That approval they have obtained. That is the explanation for the change in the correspondence from the description of the scheme as a re-routing of the River Rythe or River Rythe improvement scheme, and which was a label designed no doubt particularly to attract a grant as a drainage project, to a description as a new sewerage scheme, which was a change dating from the time when the central government grant was refused. This seems to me to be quite a reasonable explanation of the course of events. I can see nothing sinister in the mere fact that, had the matter gone through as a drainage project, to the great saving of the ratepayer if the grant was forthcoming, there would have been a compulsory purchase order and a public inquiry, whereas if it goes through (and it is exactly the same scheme in point of works) as a sewerage scheme and s 15 of the 1936 Act allows demolition of the bungalow, there will be no public inquiry, though, of course, as I have said, full compensation.

I should turn directly, I think, to s 15 (1) of the Public Health Act 1936. That provides, so far as at the moment relevant:

'A local authority may within their district ... (i) construct a public sewer—
(a) in, under or over any street, or under any cellar or vault below any street ...
and (b) in, on or over any land not forming part of a street, after giving reasonable notice to every owner and occupier of that land ...'

I think at the moment I need read no more.

The other statutory provision which at the moment I should refer to is s 3 of the Interpretation Act 1889 which provides:

'In every Act passed after the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, the following expressions shall, unless the contrary intention appears, have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them; namely ... The expression "land" shall include messuages, tenements, and hereditaments, houses, and buildings of any tenure ...'

Now, the first question is: does s 3 of the 1889 Act, which I have just read, apply to s 15 (1) (i) (b) of the 1936 Act? If it does apply, then that paragraph provides that the council may construct a public sewer in, on or over any land, including houses or buildings. The second question, if it does so apply, is this: if there be in terms, by the introduction of the 1889 Act, a power in those words, it is contended for the plaintiffs that the power to construct does not confer a power to damage, let alone wholly demolish, any house or building. It was alternatively argued that if such a power to demolish would be involved in the application of the 1889 Act, then that is itself good ground for holding that the 1889 Act does not apply. The third question for debate was that in any event it was said on behalf of the plaintiffs, on the facts, that this pipe, if constructed as proposed, will not be of the character of a public sewer.

Now, on the first question, whether the Interpretation Act 1889 applies, the learned judge thought that the contents of s 15 showed a contrary intention. He said¹:

'If the word "land" in the last category is to be expanded in accordance with the Interpretation Act 1889, s 3, it must include buildings, so that Parliament is contemplating not merely bare, unbuilt-on land which does not form "part of a street", but also buildings (including "messuages", "tenements" and "houses") which do not form "part of a street"'. The contrast, it seems, is with buildings which do form part of a street. If a building is part of a street, it must, as such, be included under sub-para (a), not requiring reasonable notice; if a building is not part of a street, it must, as such, be included under sub-para (b), requiring reasonable notice. Now I find the concept of houses and other buildings which form part of a street somewhat difficult. I also find some difficulty in perceiving why Parliament should wish to distinguish between the two types of building as regards the giving of notice. These difficulties arise only if "land" is construed as including buildings: they vanish if it does not.'

a I do not, with respect, find that reasoning sound. There seems to me no need to embody any concept of buildings forming part of a street. There does not seem to me to be any need to refer the phrase 'not forming part of a street' to any part of the extended phrase, 'land including buildings and houses', other than bare land.

b Now, it was urged on us very strongly that, both under this and under what I have referred to as the second question, the demolition point, it was wholly improbable that Parliament should have authorised a local authority, with no greater requirement than a reasonable notice, to damage (let alone demolish) a building for this purpose. But I am bound to say it appears to me that it is quite clearly something which was previously authorised by the Public Health Act 1875. Section 16 of that Act provided:

c 'Any local authority may carry any sewer through across or under [I leave out turnpike road] any street ... or under any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriageway of any street, and, after giving reasonable notice in writing to the owner or occupier (if on the report of the surveyor it appears necessary), into through or under any lands whatsoever within their district ...'

d In s 4 of that Act we have this definition which applies to land and also to the word 'premises': "'Lands" and Premises" [both words being in inverted commas] include messuages buildings lands easements and hereditaments of any tenure'.

e It appears to me that it is inescapable that in the 1875 Act what is proposed to be done, at least to the extent of being undeterred by the presence of a building, would have been perfectly open to the local authority in (say) 1935, before the 1936 Act was passed. It was a view that was expressed, albeit, obiter in *Roderick v Aston Local Board*¹. That was a case of which the headnote reads²:

f 'By the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 16, a local authority is empowered to carry any sewer "into, through, or under" any lands within its district, and the Act provides for compensation to all persons sustaining damage by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act in relation to any matters as to which they are not themselves in default. A local board under this Act proceeded to carry a sewer across the Plaintiff's pleasure grounds on such a level that the bottom of the sewer would be only slightly below the surface, and a permanent embankment about six feet high would be made:—Held ... that they were authorized so to do, for that the Act did not confine them to carrying a sewer underground.'

g Now, Sir George Jessel MR said³:

'The only question that I have to decide is, whether, under the powers of the Public Health Act, the Defendants, the Aston Local Board, have a right to carry a sewer partly under and partly above ground.'

h He then read s 16 and added these words: 'The word "lands," according to the interpretation clause includes buildings.' That, of course, was an obiter dictum. When it came to the Court of Appeal, James LJ affirmed the decision of Sir George Jessel MR. He said⁴:

i 'It is said that great injustice may be done by this construction of the Act; but I think that the compensation clause will be sufficient to give adequate compensation (and there does seem a very strong case for compensation) for

4 (1877) 5 Ch D at 334

any damage which may be sustained. It may be said that it is very hard for a piece of a man's land to be taken away without his consent and without the Defendants buying it. On the other hand, if these local authorities were obliged to buy every property with which they required to interfere, it might become impossible to carry out the requisite sanitary arrangements for the district.' a

Bramwell JA was of the same opinion; and Amphlett JA said¹: b

'I feel quite as strongly as [counsel] that there might be cases of extreme hardship under this Act, according to the construction put upon it by the Master of the Rolls. A gentleman's residence might be spoiled by taking a sewer above ground over the centre of his garden or through a part of his house. But I think we cannot vary the plain language of the Legislature by any consideration of such circumstances as those; and perhaps it is a sufficient answer, as regards the hardship, to say that if anything was done vexatiously very heavy damages would be given. But however that may be, I find in the 16th section words that I cannot get over, and to which we are bound to give effect.' c

I observe that those two references to buildings are, of course, obiter; but in a sense it was being said: 'Well, there is nothing so surprising about having your garden ruined if you can have your house ruined too.' d

Another matter to which I should advert on the subject of that case is that it was argued there, as it has been argued here in relation to s 306 of the 1936 Act, that there is good ground for not reading this power into s 15 of the 1936 Act, in that it was open to the local authority to acquire the plaintiffs' property by compulsory purchase. The same argument was advanced in the case to which I have just referred, and failed—and in my view rightly failed—because there is no particular need for the local authority to acquire this land, if all they want to do at the end of it is to lay a sewer through under the surface. The rest of it is no use to them. Indeed, it is suggested that probably, if the plaintiffs fail in this appeal and the bungalow has to be demolished, they will be compensated under the relevant section on an equivalent reinstatement basis and would be permitted by the local authority to rebuild over the sewer, which of course is a perfectly feasible thing. e

So, in my judgment, on the first question, it is not right to arrive at the conclusion that a contrary intention appears, within the meaning of the 1889 Act, in s 15. I see no reason for supposing that it was intended in 1936—although it is not only a consolidating Act but also partly an amending Act—to depart from what in my judgment was clearly the law up to 1935. f

It was pointed out that under the 1875 Act there was, so to speak a double definition because the Interpretation Act 1850 had a provision about the meaning of 'land' in public statutes comparable with that in 1889. But I think it is attributing far too great importance to a minor change in definition in the Public Health Act to say that thereby it was meant to exclude the applicability of the Interpretation Act 1889. g

It was further argued that, even if the 1875 Act would have permitted what is now proposed, there has been a change of language in the relevant sections, the 1875 Act using the phrase 'carry into, through or under' and the 1936 Act containing the phrase 'construct in, on or over'. I cannot myself see that there is any relevant significance in that change of language. It seems to me that if you carry a sewer into or through a house, you construct the sewer in the house; so that I cannot myself attach any significance to that change of language. h

I therefore conclude that the Interpretation Act 1889, s 3, is applicable; and I turn to the next point in argument: that even so, it does not entitle the local authority, in the construction of the sewer, to do any damage to any building, let alone damage j

a amounting to demolition of the building. Below, it was argued on behalf of the council that in some sense this was a power to be regarded as ancillary to the power to construct the sewer. It was not so said in this court, and it does not seem to me that that is really the way to put it. It certainly led Megarry J¹ into saying in effect: 'Really, it is a bit much to describe the demolition of a house as something which is ancillary to the laying or construction of the sewer.' It seems to me that it is not that, and it is not an implied power. If there is a power, as I think, on the construction of the 1936 Act under s 15, to construct a sewer in the line that is proposed by the local authority in this case, and if the pipe and the bungalow are of such respective sizes that the construction of the sewer on that line necessarily involves demolition, then they must have, as it seems to me, as part of the power to construct, that which is inescapable if they do construct, which in this case it is common ground is unfortunately the demolition of the bungalow. I do not regard that as an implied power. I do not regard that as an ancillary power. It is just part and parcel of the power to construct.

Accordingly, for my part, I do not see how it can be successfully argued that somehow there is to be no ability in a local authority to damage any building, however small, though every ability to damage any garden, however big. There does not seem to be any logical distinction between the two propositions. I would conclude that the Interpretation Act 1889 applies and is necessarily involved in the reading of s 15; that if it is unavoidable, as it is, in the carrying out of this scheme, then there must follow the right to demolish, either in whole or in part, to the extent that is necessary to carry through the construction, the bungalow.

Then the final point taken for the plaintiffs was that anyway this is not a public sewer. As I understand, at the end the proposition was this, that insofar as the proposed pipe will not carry foul sewage, then for the purpose of the description of a public sewer it can only be that insofar as it provides for surface water drainage from buildings, and not from roads, and not insofar as it is designed to take water direct from the River Rythe.

Now, the first part of this project, the part which concerns the plaintiffs, starts on a map exhibited to an affidavit of Mr Harris, a surveyor, at point B. At that point B it is proposed that in times of flood (which, of course, are relatively rare) part of the River Rythe will be diverted into this pipe system, ultimately finding its way out along the pipe into the Thames. But, not only in times of flood but at all times, the rest of the length from B to C will take in the surface water drainage not only of some five miles of road, which would not qualify it in the argument for the title of 'public sewer', but also the surface water drainage from, according to the evidence, some 750 existing houses and also from future houses to be built in the area, and will also immediately provide for the surface water drainage from an unstated number of shops, offices, etc.

Now, it is argued by counsel for the plaintiffs that, that being the situation, the proposed pipe cannot be dignified (if that is the right word) by the name 'public sewer'; it does not qualify because two out of its three functions are not those which qualify it for the name. This is the argument, and I am prepared to assume that two out of the three functions are not such as would qualify it for the title of 'public sewer'. But I look at it in the other way. Undoubtedly the function of draining this very large number of houses, shops, offices, etc, of their surface drainage does or would qualify it for the title of 'public sewer', and the fact that it also for convenience will absorb drainage from several miles of road and also for convenience will take some water directly out of the river in times of flood, cannot really sensibly be said to deprive it of that title. This is a point which below was not pressed, because, as was explained below, it was a point which perhaps is not an easy one and was not a very suitable one to argue on an interlocutory motion. I should have said, of course, at an early stage that after the judge had heard the matter below¹, the parties consented to treat the motion as the trial of the action. I agree with the plaintiffs that it was not an easy point to take on an interlocutory motion. I would go further. I do not think it was a very easy point to take on the trial of the action or on the appeal. I do not think it is a sound point. It seems to me, quite plainly, that what is proposed is the construction of a public sewer.

I hope I have not dealt too cavalierly with the points that have been taken. I summarise: it seems to me that there is no ground for excluding the applicability of the Interpretation Act 1889, s 3. Once it is applicable, I can see no ground for drawing a distinction between the ability to damage a man's garden or his tennis court and an ability to damage a building on the man's land. As I put it (I hope not too flippantly) in the course of argument, the argument which says that you can ruin the 18th green but you must not touch the pro's shop does not seem to me to be logical. And, the final point, it is a public sewer.

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and set aside the judgment below.

JAMES LJ. I also would allow the appeal. I agree with the judgment of Russell LJ on each of the three issues which the plaintiffs have raised. I would only add this: understandably, much of the argument for the plaintiffs has referred to the exercise of this power being possibly a gross interference with individual rights of ownership and occupation of land and buildings. There is the other side of the coin as well to be remembered in such a case as this. That which the council seeks to do is pursuant to a statutory duty that is laid on it; and if the power does exist in the statute—and I have no doubt myself that it does—it is important that the local authority is not restrained from the exercise of the power which it is its duty to exercise.

PLOWMAN J. I also agree; and, since we are differing from the learned judge, perhaps I may add a few words of my own. If his decision was right, then it seems to me that the Public Health Act 1936 has radically altered the law. Before the 1936 Act, it is, I think reasonably plain that the council could have done that which they are proposing to do in the present case, as a result of s 16 of the Public Health Act 1875, taken in conjunction with the definition of 'lands' in s 4 of that Act. This is borne out by the observations, it is true only obiter, of the Court of Appeal in *Roderick v Aston Local Board*² to which Russell LJ has referred.

Now, s 16 of the 1875 Act was repealed by the 1936 Act, and s 15 has taken its place; and the question is: does s 15 alter the law? If the Interpretation Act 1889 applies, it clearly does not alter the law, because the definition of 'lands' as including buildings is brought in. Prima facie, the Interpretation Act does apply unless, as the Act says, the contrary intention appears. Speaking for myself, I can see no contrary intention in s 15, and I conclude that the Interpretation Act does apply to it.

I think that to some extent that conclusion is reinforced by the fact that the 1936 Act is a consolidating Act, although it is true that it is said to be 'An Act to consolidate with amendments certain enactments relating to public health'. But I have seen nothing in the 1936 Act to suggest that Parliament was intending to amend the law in the particular respect.

I agree that this appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed. Order of Megarry J set aside; undertakings discharged. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

County court – Transfer of action – Transfer to High Court – Plaintiff's right to transfer action in contract or tort – Application when reasonable ground for supposing amount of damages recoverable to be in excess of amount recoverable in county court – Discretion of judge – Judge bound to order transfer when reasonable expectation that damages would exceed county court limit established – County Courts Act 1959, s 43.

c On an application by a plaintiff under s 43^a of the County Courts Act 1959 for an order to transfer an action from a county court to the High Court, the plaintiff must establish clearly that there is a reasonable expectation that damages in excess of the county court's jurisdiction will be awarded if the action is transferred to the High Court. Once the judge is satisfied that there is such a reasonable expectation he has no discretion in the matter; he must order the action to be transferred. In particular the judge is not entitled, in deciding whether to make the order, to take into account the fact that, for good or bad reasons, the plaintiff originally chose the county court as his forum (see p 1132 e and g, p 1133 e and h and p 1134 b c e to g and j to p 1135 b, post).

f Interlocutory appeal

The plaintiff, Margaret Stiffel, started proceedings in the Shoreditch County Court against the defendants, Industrial Dwelling Society Ltd and C H James, claiming damages for negligence. On 15th February 1973 she applied for an order transferring the action to the High Court. His Honour Judge Willis refused the application and the plaintiff appealed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Edmund Davies LJ.

h EDMUND DAVIES LJ. This is the plaintiff's appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Willis made at the Shoreditch County Court on 15th February 1973. The plaintiff, a spinster lady in her late sixties, who had sustained an accident on 13th April 1970, started proceedings in the county court for negligence against both defendants. The claim was launched by particulars dated 7th December 1971 and she then limited her damages to the maximum amount recoverable in the county court, namely, £750. Thereafter certain medical reports were furnished to her solicitors and to the solicitors acting for the other side. As a result of the material in that way becoming available to the plaintiff's legal advisers, on 15th February 1973 she applied to the learned county court judge under s 43 of the County Courts Act 1959

that the action be transferred to the High Court. The learned judge refused that application and it is from that refusal that the plaintiff now appeals. a

It may be convenient at this stage to read the short note of the judgment of the learned county court judge. He said:

‘Having read the medical reports of Mr Stewart Prince for the plaintiff and Mr Fermont for the defendants I am entitled to exercise my own discretion as to the value of this claim. The plaintiff has chosen her forum and should not now be allowed to move from it. I therefore dismiss this application.’ b

Section 43 of the Act is entitled ‘Plaintiff’s right to transfer action of contract or tort from county court to High Court so as to increase his claim’. It provides as follows:

‘(1) Where there is commenced in the county court an action founded on contract or tort wherein the plaintiff claims damages, the plaintiff may at any time apply to the judge for an order to transfer the action to the High Court, on the ground that there is reasonable ground for supposing the amount recoverable in respect of his claim to be in excess of the amount recoverable in the action in the county court. c

‘(2) If, on any such application, the judge is satisfied that there is reasonable ground as aforesaid, the judge shall make an order that the action be transferred to the High Court.’ d

I do not find this section, which appears not to have been the subject-matter of any reported decision, wholly easy to interpret. On two points, however, I am satisfied. First, no exercise of discretion is involved, for if the ‘reasonable ground’ referred to is established, the judge must order a transfer. Second, if the learned judge was of the opinion that the question whether the plaintiff should be allowed to transfer her action to the High Court turned in any respect on the fact that she had originally launched her proceedings in the county court, he misdirected himself. Section 43 postulates that proceedings have been commenced in the county court and its sole raison d’être is to deal with that situation. A person may start proceedings in the county court for a variety of reasons, some good originally but no longer good, or maybe for reasons which were never adequate. But where the plaintiff’s right to have an action transferred from the county court under s 43 is under consideration, the judge must reject from his mind the fact that the plaintiff originally launched proceedings in the county court. The sole task he has to perform (and I do not think the wording of the section makes the performance of that task any easier) is that of deciding whether there is reasonable ground for supposing that the amount recoverable in respect of the claim is in excess of the amount recoverable in an action in the county court. e

The medical reports now available are conflicting. There are two reports of Dr Prince furnished to the plaintiff’s advisers on 1st December 1971 and 18th July 1972, and by a letter of 15th November 1972 he added that he thought the plaintiff’s condition was permanent. The incident which gave rise to the action may be described in a couple of sentences. When some plumbing work was being done by the second defendant, acting on behalf of the first defendants, in the flat occupied by the plaintiff some caustic material spurted out of one of the pipes in the flat and inflicted on the plaintiff what were described as superficial first-degree burns. In my judgment, the reports furnished by Dr Prince, if they stood alone, afford grounds for thinking that the plaintiff had a reasonable expectation that (but for the limitation on the amount which the county court could award) she would recover more than £750. The report of Dr Fermont, furnished to the defendants, is less favourable to her than those of Dr Prince; but I am not persuaded that even that report establishes beyond any doubt that (if it stood alone) the plaintiff would be bound to recover f

a less than £750. I say that because, while expressing the view that the lady's physical condition rapidly cleared up following the accident, Dr Fermont said there was a certain amount of nervous tension induced by the accident still enduring at the time of his report of 25th February 1972. He ended by saying:

'I therefore feel that she will be fully restored to her pre-accident state of health in the course of the next 4-6 months with no residual ill-effects remaining.'

b In other words he was saying that she would not be wholly clear of all consequences of the accident under about two years and a couple of months after the accident, which is a substantial period of time. Having regard to the sort of awards which are current in these days for personal injuries, I therefore cannot say that I am convinced that if Dr Fermont's evidence were on its own it would establish that the plaintiff
c had no reasonable expectation of recovering more than £750, though I would be somewhat surprised if she did.

On the other hand, Dr Prince's reports induce in me the expectation, which I hope is a reasonable one, that if his testimony received complete acceptance by the court of trial the plaintiff would recover more than £750. Counsel for the plaintiff suggested that the amount recovered might be as much as £1,500, but I deliberately abstain
d from expressing any view about the latter. Indeed, it would be most undesirable in this interlocutory appeal for me to do anything of the kind.

What is meant by the words in s 43 (1) of the Act—

'... on the ground that there is reasonable ground for supposing the amount recoverable in respect of his claim to be in excess of the amount recoverable in the action in the county court'

e They render it incumbent on the plaintiff to establish with clarity that she has brought herself within the subsection. Unless she does that, unless she convinces this court that there are reasonable grounds for supposing the amount recoverable to be in excess of £750, she must fail. Then what is meant by the word 'supposing'?
f It does not, as I think, involve the process of deciding. The judge cannot embark on the process of deciding between rival and conflicting medical reports furnished by potential witnesses whom he has not seen and whose evidence he has not heard. Of course, if the reports point all one way, that is to say, without conflicting as between themselves, and they indicate clearly that the claim is not worth more than £750, or if they establish that it is clearly worth more than £750, then no difficulty arises: in the former case the application for transfer should be dismissed, in the latter case
g it should succeed. The difficulty arises in a case such as this—it is one which I have not met before—where there are conflicting reports, some pointing towards an award in excess of £750 and others in the opposite direction. The learned judge cannot, as I have said, be expected (nor would it be proper for him to attempt) to decide which of those reports would be likely to find favour with the court of trial. But there must be reasonable grounds for supposing the amount recoverable to be in excess of that h recoverable in the action in the county court. I think that this means and can mean no more than that, when the county court judge is confronted with an application under s 43, he must ask whether the plaintiff has clearly demonstrated that there is a reasonable expectation that if the action were transferred to the High Court the damages awarded to her would turn out to be more than £750.

i The Act recognises that it would be manifestly unjust that a person entitled to recover a sum in excess of that which can be awarded under the county court jurisdiction should be denied proper compensation because, as it happens, that is the forum that she has chosen. The Act provides an escape from that situation of injustice, provided always that the plaintiff establishes reasonable grounds for the transfer. I think that in the present case reasonable ground was established. Notwithstanding the conflicting views expressed by Dr Fermont, the reports of Dr Prince pointed with sufficient clarity to the view that this plaintiff had a reasonable expectation of recovering more than £750. Accordingly, I would be for allowing this appeal and making the order of transfer sought by the plaintiff. a

BUCKLEY LJ. I agree. If the learned judge intended, by the language which is used in the very short note of his judgment which we have, to suggest that he was exercising a discretionary jurisdiction under s 43 I think with due respect to him that he was mistaken. The duty cast on the judge by an application under the section for transfer of an action from the county court to the High Court is first to decide whether he is or is not satisfied on the material before him that there is reasonable ground for supposing that the amount that the plaintiff will recover will be in excess of the limits of the county court's jurisdiction. Once he is satisfied one way or the other the course which he must take is not a discretionary one but is clear under the section. If he is satisfied that there is no reasonable ground for supposing that the claim will be in excess of the limit of the county court's jurisdiction, then he will leave the action to be tried in the county court: but if he is satisfied that there is reasonable ground for supposing that it will be in excess of the limit of the county court's jurisdiction he is bound to transfer the action into the High Court. That is made plain by the use of the word 'shall' in sub-s (2). b

The learned judge also apparently took the view that the plaintiff's choice of the county court as the forum in which she would bring her action was one relevant consideration in deciding whether or not to order a transfer. In my judgment the only effect of the fact that the plaintiff has chosen the county court as the forum in which to initiate her action is that the burden is thrown on her if she wishes to get it transferred to the High Court of making out a case under s 43. Ex hypothesi every applicant under s 43 must have chosen the county court as the court in which he or she should initiate his or her action. As Edmund Davies LJ has said, that may have been a choice made for good reason at the time when it was made, but matters may have come to light or may have come to the fore since the plaint was issued which suggest that it would be right to transfer the case into the High Court, or the choice may have been an ill-advised one in the first place, in which case the plaintiff ought not to be hampered by that unhappy choice from getting his or her proceedings into the court in which they can be properly tried and disposed of. e

The policy underlying the section, as I ventured to suggest during argument, appears to me to be to ensure that an action is tried in a jurisdiction in which the plaintiff will be able to recover whatever is the full measure of the damages to which he is entitled without being restricted by a statutory limit on the jurisdiction of the court in which the proceedings are tried. If on the material before the court when the application is brought before it under s 43 the court is satisfied that there is a reasonable expectation that the plaintiff will at the trial recover more than the amount recoverable in the county court, it is right that the action should be transferred into the High Court where that limit will not inhibit the plaintiff's ability to recover what is his due. The difficulty arises really on the language of s 43 (1) and particularly on the words, 'on the ground that there is reasonable ground for supposing the amount recoverable in respect of his claim to be in excess of the amount recoverable in the action in the county court'. Emphasis has naturally been placed on the use of the words 'to be'. The subsection does not use the language 'on the ground that there is reasonable ground for supposing that the amount recoverable may be', but says 'to be'. Reading the language of the phrase as a whole, in my judgment it is clear that the court before whom the application comes does not have to be satisfied to the degree of certainty that the plaintiff will recover more than the limit of the county court jurisdiction. The court has to be satisfied that there is a reasonable expectation that the plaintiff will recover more than that. That is I think really indistinguishable from saying that the amount he will recover may turn out g

to be more; but it has got to be a reasonable expectation, a real one and not a fanciful one. It may be that the probable or possible excess has got to be sufficiently substantial for the court to say that it is really satisfied that there is this likelihood. On the facts in the present case, for the reasons that Edmund Davies LJ has elaborated in his judgment, I think this is a case which should have been transferred into the High Court and accordingly I think the appeal should be allowed.

SCARMAN LJ. I agree.

RUSSELL, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

26th, 27th FEBRUARY, 27th MARCH 1973

Administration of estates – Interest of Crown – Order for sale – Power of court – Application of Attorney-General – Power to order sale in any proceedings in High Court when it appears to court that Crown entitled to estate or interest in hereditament – Scope of power – Escheat to Crown – Freehold estate devised by testator in 1851 – Estate subject to lease – Rents collected by solicitors – Solicitors unable to trace any person claiming to be beneficially entitled to freehold reversion – Solicitors seeking directions of High Court as to disposal of accumulated rents – Crown appearing to have interest by escheat – Title of Crown not established for purpose of proceedings – Whether court having power to order sale – Intestates Estates Act 1884, s 5.

The testator died in 1851 and by his will devised certain premises to his sons and their issue. A firm of brewers were subsequently granted a tenancy of the property which they had occupied ever since. From 1903 a firm of solicitors had collected the rent. The solicitors had no record of any title deeds and no one had ever appeared to claim the rents. Accordingly the partners of the firm as trustees issued an originating summons, joining the Attorney-General as defendant, seeking the directions of the court. An enquiry was ordered; the enquiry was conducted in chambers and, following advertisements, the master certified that 'No person has come in and established before me a claim to be beneficially entitled in priority to the Crown' to the rents. In the same proceedings, and before the judge had considered the adequacy of the enquiry, the Attorney-General applied for an order for the sale of the property under s 5^a of the Intestates Estates Act 1884 on the ground that 'it appears to the court that Her Majesty is entitled' to the property. The judge held that s 5 only applied to proceedings where the Crown's title was established for the purposes of and in the course of the action and not to proceedings where the ascertainment of the title of the Crown was purely incidental and outside the scope of any relief claimed by the plaintiff. Accordingly he dismissed the summons and the Attorney-General appealed.

Held – It was sufficient for the purposes of s 5 that the proceedings were such as to involve a conclusion as to the Crown's title to the realty either directly, or as a step towards or as a consequence of the outcome of the proceedings. The same matters which properly would lead to a conclusion that the Crown was entitled to the accumulated rents would lead to the same conclusion in relation to the Crown's entitlement to the realty by escheat. Consequently, as a matter of procedure, the proceedings were such as would enable an application such as that made by the Attorney-General to be entertained. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the case remitted to the judge to decide whether it appeared to him that the Crown was entitled to the property by escheat and, if so, whether to exercise the power under s 5 to order a sale (see p 1139 g and h and p 1140 a and b, post).

Per Curiam. If the power of sale were exercised and a claimant appeared after execution of the sale it would be open to him to recover the proceeds of sale from the Crown by proceedings under the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 provided the claim was not statute-barred (see p 1140 e to g, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the Attorney-General, the defendant in proceedings commenced by originating summons by the plaintiffs, Richard Westray More and Roland Knight, against an order of Goulding J dated 7th November 1972 whereby he dismissed the Attorney-General's application for an order under s 5 of the Intestates Estates Act 1884 for the sale of certain freehold premises known as the Phoenix Inn, Stratford-upon-Avon. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

e Cur adv vult

- 27th March. RUSSELL LJ read the following judgment of the court. This appeal from Goulding J touches a subject nowadays rarely discussed and even more rarely encountered in practice, escheat to the Crown of realty propter defectum sanguinis, or for want of heirs. By a happy chance the topic has arisen from the past in connection with premises known as the Phoenix Inn in Stratford-upon-Avon. In certain pending proceedings later described the Crown sought, under s 5 of the Intestates Estates Act 1884, an order for the sale of those premises, subject, of course, to the current tenancy, and the consequent payment of the proceeds of sale to the Treasury Solicitor, on the ground that it should have appeared to the court that the Crown was entitled thereto by such escheat. Goulding J dismissed the application on the ground that the proceedings in question were not such as were envisaged by the section as appropriate for such an order as was sought, and that if the Crown wished to proceed with its wish to have the property sold it must look for other procedure, perhaps by the process of inquisition and office found.

- g The pending proceedings were of this nature. In 1851 one Septimus Lowe died, having by his will devised the property in question first to his son Joseph for life with remainder to Joseph's children in equal shares absolutely, with no requirement of attainment of any age or survival of their parent; failing that devise then to his son Charles for life and similarly to Charles's children; and failing those devises to his eldest son John absolutely. It is not known when Joseph died; he was born in 1828; he emigrated to Peru and a letter from him in 1863 indicated that he then had a daughter. Nothing is known of him or any child of his. Charles was born in 1830 and died in 1880; nothing is known of any children of Charles. John died in 1896 and nothing is known of any children. Nothing is known of any will of any of these people.

- j Many years ago a firm of brewers was granted a tenancy from year to year of the property by John acting under a power of attorney from Joseph. That firm or its successors in business have remained in occupation under that tenancy ever since. A firm of solicitors has for many years collected the modest rent, their records going back to 1903. Obviously they have so collected the rent on behalf of, and are trustees for, whomsoever might be entitled to the property under the provisions of Septimus Lowe's will or on the intestacy or through the will of someone who became so entitled. The solicitors have no record of any title deeds. No one appeared to claim these rents in the solicitors' hands, and the funds representing them having reached a total approaching £4,000, partners in the firm, as trustees thereof for someone, issued an originating summons in the Chancery Division joining the Attorney-General representing the Crown as defendant, asking for the directions of the court. On this the court ordered an enquiry to be made—

'What persons are now entitled to the above-mentioned fund representing accumulated rents of the Phoenix Inn . . . settled by the will of Septimus Sutton Lowe deceased and in what shares and proportions.'

The enquiry was conducted in chambers, with advertisements in this country and Peru, with no result at all. On 10th November 1971 the master certified that—

'No person has come in and established before me a claim to be beneficially entitled in priority to the Crown to the above mentioned fund . . .'

There has as yet been no further consideration of the matter by the judge, whether the enquiry has been sufficiently extensive, whether, for example, it might be relevant to see whether the two sons who died in England left wills. Let us say that we were not invited to consider the adequacy of the enquiry. In the same proceedings the Attorney-General then applied for an order for sale of the property under s 5 of the 1884 Act. Before reading that Act we would remark that without an inquisition and office found the Crown, in the case of a supposed escheat for want of heirs, could by statute make a regrant of the land to persons with good ex gratia or moral claims (see the Crown Land Act 1819) or enter and hold the land (see the Queen's Remembrancer's Act 1859: but the Crown could not sell the land without inquisition and office found.

The 1884 Act is entitled:

'An Act to amend the Law respecting the administration of the Personal Estate and the Escheat of the Real Estate of Deceased Persons; and for other purposes.'

Section 2 concerns personal estate of a deceased person when administration is granted to a nominee of the Crown, and s 3 concerns limitation of actions by or against the Crown in respect of personal estate of a deceased person. Section 4 extends escheat to any legal or equitable estate or interest in an incorporeal hereditament and to any equitable estate or interest in any corporeal hereditament. Section 5 is in the following terms:

'(1) Where in any action or other proceeding in Her Majesty's High Court of Justice or in the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster it appears to the court that Her Majesty is entitled to any hereditament, corporeal or incorporeal, or to any estate or interest, legal or equitable, therein, such court may, on the application or with the consent of the Attorney-General, notwithstanding that no office has been found and no commission issued or executed, order a sale of the hereditament, estate, or interest, and such portion of the net proceeds of any such sale as represents the interest of Her Majesty shall be paid, invested, transferred, sold or disposed of in manner provided by section four of the Treasury Solicitor Act, 1876.

'(2) Section one of the Act of the session of the fifteenth and sixteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter fifty-five, intituled "An Act to extend the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1850," shall apply on any such sale in a like manner as if any estate or interest of Her Majesty comprised in the sale were vested in a subject.'

Section 6, to some extent, extends and regulates the power in the Crown to regrant escheated land, but is not, we think, directly relevant.

Goulding J took the view that in those proceedings there was no jurisdiction to order a sale of the land. He said this in the course of his judgment:

b 'The third objection is of a more radical character. It is common ground that the plaintiffs have no interest whatever in the real estate as such and no locus standi to make application in respect thereof to the court. Therefore, if it appears to the court in the course of these proceedings as they stand or as amended by the plaintiffs that the Crown has become entitled to the Phoenix Inn, that can only
c be incidental to and not the necessary foundation or consequence of anything the court has to determine at the suit of the plaintiffs. In the absence of authority and on a cursory look at the 1884 Act to see its general scope it appears to me that Parliament did not intend such a consequence as the Attorney-General suggests. The words "Where in any action or other proceeding in Her Majesty's d High Court of Justice or in the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster it appears to the court that Her Majesty is entitled" mean that the Crown's title should be established for the purposes of and in the course of such action although the action may be directed to other matters relating to the property. The action must have the property as its subject-matter. The only reported case that has been found where s 5 applies is not inconsistent with this view: *Re Pratt's Trusts*¹. There persons beneficially entitled to a share
e of certain land that had escheated at law sought the appointment of new trustees and a vesting order in favour of those trustees. The Attorney-General intervened and requested a sale under s 5 which was duly ordered. The case throws therefore no decisive light on the present question. The procedure is not applicable where the ascertainment of the title of the Crown is purely incidental and outside the scope of any relief claimed by the plaintiffs. The reason for the present f application is to avoid the inconveniences of the alternative procedure mentioned in s 5 of the 1884 Act itself. Whether at present it would be open to the Attorney-General as an alternative to the old procedure to initiate proceedings under the Rules of the Supreme Court for a declaratory judgment is a matter on which I express no view either way. The summons of 13th June 1972 should therefore be dismissed.'

g In our judgment, this takes too limited a view of the section. In our judgment, it is sufficient that the proceedings are such as to involve a conclusion as to the Crown's title to the realty either directly, or as a step towards or as a consequence of the outcome of the proceedings. It appears to us that the same matters which properly would lead to a conclusion that it appears that the Crown is entitled to the accumulated
h rents would lead to the same conclusion in relation to the Crown's entitlement to the realty in question by escheat. We consider that the only points that might be relevant to the latter question, but perhaps not to the former, are two. First, the hypothetical possibility that the testator was not the freeholder but only the owner of a very long lease at a peppercorn; but this is prima facie negated by the clear references in the will to the property as 'hereditaments' devised to devisees.
j Second, the theoretical possibility of escheat to some mesne lord, a factor which apparently weighed considerably in the judge's mind; but our attention was drawn to passages in learned works which satisfy us that the possibility of the emergence of the mesne lord in respect of this estate of (in 1851) freehold is one that is so remote that it may be wholly ignored for present purposes. (We refer, for brevity, only to The Law of Real Property by Megarry and Wade¹.)

Consequently in our judgment, as a matter of procedure—which was the only ground on which the decision went—the proceedings were such as would enable an application such as that of the Attorney-General to be entertained, and we therefore set aside the order of the learned judge. But that, of course, is by no means to substitute for it an order for sale; the matter must be remitted to the judge for him to arrive at a conclusion whether 'it appears to the court' that the Crown is entitled to the property by escheat, and whether, if so, to exercise the power to order a sale. As we have said, the form of the certificate of the master and the enquiries and evidence on which it was based have not yet been considered by the judge, and we are not asked to express an opinion on those matters. It might, however, be of service if we were to express an opinion on some points.

It would, we apprehend, be open to the judge, if satisfied that every reasonable step had been taken in an attempt to trace individuals entitled to the fund, and that it was most improbable that any individual would ever establish a title, either to direct payment to the Crown or to authorise payment to the Crown on the footing that no individual was entitled (see *Re Benjamin*²). In either of those cases if an individual subsequently established a title, not barred by any limitation period, we apprehend that he could sue the Crown for payment of his share: see *Ministry of Health v Simpson*³ without having to trace the moneys received. In the case of sale of the realty by order under s 5 of the 1884 Act and consequent receipt by the Crown of proceeds of sale the situation procedurally is different. We were told on behalf of the Attorney-General that in such a case an heir subsequently appearing could have no claim against the Crown. We do not believe this to be so, if he be not barred by limitation of action. The Crown would have wrongly received assets of the deceased's estate, and in principle the case last cited would be applicable. We see nothing in the reference in s 5 of the 1884 Act to s 4 of the Treasury Solicitor Act 1876 to contradict this. Robertson on Civil Proceedings by and against the Crown⁴ discusses in the case where there has been inquisition and office found, whether a claimant can proceed by petition of right or whether he must proceed by traverse of the office, and concludes that he may proceed by petition of right; this assumes that some remedy is available even after office found; and proceeding by petition of right would now be proceedings under the Crown Proceedings Act 1947. If a claimant could recover land after office found by petition of right we do not see why he could not have recovered the proceeds of sale if the land had been sold after office found. (As to claims to personal estate of a deceased person received by the Crown see Robertson⁵.) In those circumstances, it may well be that the judge will in the end find that it appears sufficiently to him that the Crown is entitled to the land, and will order a sale.

Accordingly, the order below will be set aside and the matter remitted to the Chancery Division.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to Chancery Division to decide whether it appeared to the court that the Crown was entitled to the property by escheat and if so to exercise the power to order a sale.

b Trade description – False or misleading statement – Provision of services – False statement as to provision in the course of trade or business of any services – Qualification to provide services – Statement made by person that he is properly qualified to provide services – Whether ‘statement . . . as to . . . provision . . . of services’ – Trade Descriptions Act 1968, s 14 (1) (i).

c Trade description – False or misleading statement – Provision of services – Statement in the course of any trade or business – Trade or business – Profession – Statement made by professional man in course of providing professional services – Whether ‘trade or business’ including profession – Trade Descriptions Act 1968, s 14 (1).

d The accused carried on business as an architect. He advertised himself as a qualified architect. A client engaged the accused to draw up plans for large scale alterations to the client’s house on the strength of a representation by the accused that he was a qualified architect. In fact he was not qualified; he was an architectural student who had not completed the examinations necessary to qualify as an architect. The accused was convicted of knowingly making a false statement as to the provision of services in the course of a trade or business, contrary to s 14 (1)^a of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. He appealed against conviction contending (i) that the words ‘statement . . . as to . . . the provision . . . of services’ in s 14 (1) (i) referred to the nature of the services performed and not to the identity or qualifications of the person who performed them, and (ii) that s 14 only applied to services supplied in the course of a trade or business and not to professional services.

f Held – (i) A person who carried on a business consisting of the provision of services and who falsely represented that he was properly qualified to perform those services had made a false ‘statement . . . as to . . . the provision of services’ within s 14 (1) (i) since his qualifications would be relevant to the likely quality of the services to be provided. It followed therefore that the false statement made by the accused to his client came within the terms of s 14 (1) (see p 1143 j and p 1144 a to d, post).

g (ii) Whether or not s 14 (1) applied to the performance of professional services, it was not open to the accused to say that he was performing professional services when he lacked the qualifications necessary for carrying on that profession (see p 1144 e, post).

(iii) Accordingly the accused had been properly convicted and the appeal would be dismissed.

h Semle. Section 14 (1) of the 1968 Act applies to statements made by professional men in the course of providing professional services (see p 1144 f, post).

Appeal

On 28th March 1972 in the Crown Court at Preston before his Honour Judge Openshaw the appellant was convicted of making a false statement as to the provision of services contrary to s 14 (1) (a) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 on a prosecution initiated by the Architects' Registration Council. The particulars of the offence were that on 26th April 1970 in the county of Lancaster in the course of business with Dennis Vincent Armitage and Iris Armitage the appellant had made a statement, which he knew to be false, as to the provision of his services in relation to proposed alterations to the house of Mr and Mrs Armitage, namely, that he was an architect. He was sentenced to a fine of £200 and was ordered to pay £200 towards the cost of the prosecution. He appealed against conviction, inter alia, on the following grounds: (i) that the alleged false statement was not one made in the course of any trade or business within the meaning of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, in that the appellant provided services of a professional character, namely architectural services, and (ii) that the appellant's statement was not a false statement as to the 'provision' of any services, accommodation or facilities, in that he provided such services, namely surveying, drawing plans and obtaining planning permission; the false statement alleged by the prosecution related to the professional qualifications of the appellant rather than the provision of any services. The appellant also appealed against sentence. The appeal first came before the court (Cairns LJ, Caulfield and Forbes JJ) on 9th February 1973, when it was adjourned for hearing before a full court of five judges. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

John Wilmers QC and Philip Goodenday for the Crown.

LORD WIDGERY CJ delivered the judgment of the court. On 28th March 1972 at the Preston Crown Court, the appellant was convicted of making a false statement as to the provisions of services contrary to s 14 (1) (a) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968; he was fined £200 and ordered to pay £200 towards the costs of the prosecution. He appeals to this court by leave of the single judge against conviction and sentence, and the matter has been heard by five judges because it seems to raise a point of significance on an Act which is frequently before this court, namely the Trade Descriptions Act 1968.

What happened is no longer in dispute, because the jury have already pronounced on it. A gentleman called Armitage who was living with his wife and family at 8 Princes Way, Cleveleys, decided that they would like to make some fairly substantial alterations to their house, and for this purpose they required someone to draw up plans; it is quite evident that they needed a qualified architect for that purpose. They had apparently had experience before with an unqualified architect, and it is beyond dispute that a qualified architect was what they wanted. They looked at the yellow pages of the telephone directory, and under the generic description 'Architects' they found the name of the appellant. Moreover, in the ordinary pages of the telephone directory he had seen fit to describe himself as 'ARIBA'. He was in truth an architectural student who had passed his intermediate examination, and who may one day qualify as an architect and become entitled to those letters after his name; but at the time these offences occurred, he was no more than a part-trained architect, and was not entitled to describe himself as an architect. Nevertheless he a did, and when Mr Armitage made it quite clear that they wanted a qualified architect for the purpose, he said 'I am an architect, just the sort of person you are looking for'. He then proceeded to draw up plans, and it is not necessary to pursue the early stages of the history of this matter. There was a disagreement between himself and Mr Armitage as to the nature of the plans drawn; there was a county court action in which the appellant sued Mr Armitage for his fees, and indeed in which the b appellant was successful. It was in the course of those proceedings that his lack of proper qualifications came to light.

The Trade Descriptions Act 1968, which is the lineal successor to the Merchandise Marks Act 1887, contains certain features which did not appear in the earlier legislation, and in particular contains provisions designed to protect the consumer, if that is not an inappropriate word, who makes a bargain with a person carrying on a trade or business in the provision of services. In other words s 14 under which
c this charge was laid, is not concerned with the sale of goods, matters which find their place earlier in the Act, but with the provision of services. I shall read the whole of s 14 (1) because I think it necessary in order to get this matter in its proper perspective:

d 'It shall be an offence for any person in the course of any trade or business—
(a) to make a statement which he knows to be false; or (b) recklessly to make a statement which is false; as to any of the following matters, that is to say,—(i) the provision in the course of any trade or business of any services, accommodation or facilities; (ii) the nature of any services, accommodation or facilities provided in the course of any trade or business; (iii) the time at which, manner in which or persons by whom any services, accommodation or facilities are so e provided; (iv) the examination, approval or evaluation by any person of any services, accommodation or facilities so provided; or (v) the location or amenities of any accommodation so provided.'

One might be permitted the observation that given that the man in question is carrying on a trade or business in the provision of services, then those various categories
f are extremely wide both individually and in total and cover a very large area in which false statements may give rise to prosecution under the Act.

In this case the prosecution relied on s 14 (1) (a) (i), that is to say, they said that by calling himself an architect when he was not, he in the course of a trade or business made a false statement as to the provision in the course of any trade or business of any service. It seems to this court that the first question logically for consideration, g and perhaps the most difficult and fundamental question, is whether if a man carrying on a trade or business in the provision of services falsely gives himself a personal qualification which he does not possess, the giving of that personal qualification can fairly be said to come within the words which I have read of s 14 (1) (a) (i), namely whether the giving himself of that qualification is a false statement as to the provision of any services.

h It has been argued forcefully by counsel for the appellant, to whom the court is indebted for his argument, that the phrase which I have just read, that which refers to the provision of any services, is a phrase concerned with the nature of the services performed, not with the identity or qualifications of the person who performs them. In other words, he says that given that the appellant was doing the work of an architect, the fact that he falsely described himself as an architect does not amount to j a false statement as to the provision of the services.

The court has given careful consideration to this matter, because it clearly is one of considerable importance, and it has come to the conclusion that there is no reason for saying that a man carrying on business whose business is the provision of services does not commit an offence under s 14 (1) (a) (i) if he adopts to himself a personal qualification which he does not enjoy.

For example, and one quotes it only as an example, suppose that a motor mechanic sets up in business to repair motor cars, and suppose that he announces to his prospective customers that he did a five year apprenticeship with Rolls-Royce when that is not the fact. We think that in a case of that kind it could perfectly properly be said that the man in question, in the course of a trade or business, had made a statement which he knew to be false and that it was a statement as to the provision of services which he offered, because it goes without saying that a qualified man is likely, in general, to do a better job than an unqualified man, and the fact that a man has qualifications, such as an architect or an apprentice with five years experience with Rolls-Royce, is the sort of factor which goes to the likely quality of the service which he will perform, and is, we think, without any straining of language, properly to be taken to be within the term that the statement is made as to the provisions of services, to quote the actual statutory words.

There is no doubt in our judgment in this case that the appellant was carrying on what on the face of it was a business. He was carrying on a continuous activity with a view to gain and profit by drawing plans for people who wanted them. There is no doubt he made this false statement in the course of that activity, and for the reasons which I have already given, we think it comes within the terms of s 14 (1) (a) (i).

However, it has been argued that s 14 has no application to professions, but only to businesses. It has therefore been submitted that the activity in this case should not be regarded as being in the course of a trade or business, because it is in the course, so the argument goes, of a profession, and therefore not struck at by s 14 at all.

The first answer to that submission, and the one on which we would wish to rely, is that it does not lie in the mouth of this appellant to say that he is conducting an activity of a professional character when he lacks the professional qualifications necessary for the carrying on of that profession. We are quite unable to see how, given that the appellant's activity is of a commercial and business character, he can escape from the obligation under the section by saying that his work was really professional when at the same time he lacked the professional qualification necessary. That in itself in our judgment is enough to dispose of the argument that this case is concerned with profession and not business, and we do not, therefore, find it necessary today finally to decide whether s 14 has application to genuine professional men or not. All we would say is that we do not wish anything which is said in the course of this judgment to suggest that professional men are not within the ambit of s 14.

Accordingly, it seems to us that this conviction was properly entered as a matter of law, and that the appeal against conviction must be dismissed.

[Counsel for appellant then addressed the court on sentence.]

LORD WIDGERY CJ. We take the view, having regard to the nature of this offence and to the maximum penalty to which he would have been liable under the professional legislation, and further having regard to the state of his means at the present time, that the financial penalty was too heavy. I pause to observe that whenever imposing a financial penalty, regard must be had to a man's means to pay. If he is ordered to pay more than he can possibly pay, the sentence is inevitably in effect a sentence of imprisonment. Having said that, we shall allow the appeal as to sentence, set aside the orders made below, order that the costs of the prosecution below be paid out of central funds, and not out of the pocket of the appellant, and reduce his fine from one of £200 to one of £100.

Appeal against conviction dismissed. Appeal against sentence allowed and fine varied.

LORD WIDGERY CJ, NIELD AND WILLIS JJ

b

Criminal law – Appeal – No miscarriage of justice – Power to substitute alternative verdict – No miscarriage of justice if jury had convicted of alternative offence – Finding by jury of facts essential to establish alternative offence – Conviction of murder – Evidence of accused's wife – Wife only eye-witness – Wife's evidence inadmissible – Ample other evidence to support a conviction of manslaughter – Whether court having power to substitute verdict of manslaughter – Criminal Appeal Act 1968, ss 2 (1) proviso, 3 (1).

An argument took place between the appellant, his wife and the wife's brother, H. The appellant took a shot gun and levelled it at H's head. It went off and killed H. A further struggle developed between the appellant and his wife, during which the gun went off twice, the first time missing the wife and the second wounding her in the hand. The appellant was charged with the murder of H (count 1) and with the attempted murder of his wife (count 2). No application was made to sever the indictment and no application was made to call the wife on the appellant's behalf. The wife was the sole eye-witness of what had happened and gave evidence to the effect that the appellant had deliberately shot H. The appellant gave evidence that he had bought the gun to shoot himself, and that it had gone off accidentally killing H. The jury returned a verdict of murder on count 1, but were discharged from returning a verdict on count 2. On appeal it was common ground that the wife was a competent witness on count 2 but was not a competent witness for the Crown on count 1 except on the application of the appellant.

Held – Although there was a good deal of evidence on which the jury could have convicted of murder if the wife had not given evidence, her evidence was of such weight and importance that it was impossible to say that the verdict of the jury would have been the same if either the wife had not been called or the jury had been given a direction to exclude her evidence. On the other hand there was no doubt that the jury, if properly instructed, would at least have convicted the appellant of manslaughter. However in considering whether to apply the proviso to s 2 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 the court had no power to substitute a verdict for a different offence on the footing that no miscarriage of justice would have occurred if the jury had convicted of that offence. Furthermore the court only had power to substitute a conviction of an alternative offence under s 3 (1)^a of the 1968 Act when it appeared from the finding of the jury that the facts essential to establish the alternative offence had been proved. Since the wife's evidence had coloured the entire findings of the jury it was impossible to say that the jury had found facts appropriate to a verdict of manslaughter except on the footing that they had received support in their finding from the evidence of the wife. It followed that there was no power to substitute a verdict of manslaughter, and accordingly the conviction of murder should be quashed and the appeal allowed (see p 1147 j to p 1148 c and g h, post).

Appeal

On 25th February 1972 at the Central Criminal Court before Forbes J and a jury the appellant, William Roland David Deacon, was convicted, on count 1 of an indictment, of the murder of his brother-in-law, Ronald Huxley, and sentenced to life imprisonment. The jury were discharged from giving a verdict on count 2, which charged the appellant with the attempted murder of his wife. He appealed against conviction with leave of O'Connor J. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

13th April. LORD WIDGERY CJ read the following judgment of the court. On 25th February 1972 at the Central Criminal Court, the appellant was convicted on count 1 of an indictment charging the murder of his brother-in-law, one Ronald Huxley, and the jury were discharged from giving a verdict on a second count which alleged attempted murder of the appellant's wife. He was sentenced to life imprisonment, and now appeals against conviction by leave of the single judge.

The appellant and his wife had lived for some time at the matrimonial home in East London, but differences had arisen between them. The wife left home for a period and took the children to her mother's house. The appellant said that he wanted his wife and family to return. The brother-in-law became involved in the discussion and suggested that the sensible thing would be, in the first instance, for the appellant to move out of the house and let the wife and children return there to live. The appellant seems to have agreed to this general proposal and a date was set for the move which was to be 13th October 1971.

On that day the brother-in-law drove the wife with the children to the matrimonial home. The appellant was there, looking at some photographs, and in a very short time arguments developed. The wife's account of the affair was that she turned round and saw that her husband had a double-barrelled gun which was aimed at the level of his brother-in-law's head. Angry words were exchanged, and the appellant taxed his wife with having said that he had been with another woman, and in the midst of this altercation the appellant, according to his wife, raised the gun and shot the brother-in-law, injuring him fatally. The wife said that thereafter the appellant told her to get up to bed; he put the gun down, seized her by the neck and threatened to strangle her. In the course of the struggle he picked up the gun again, they wrestled for it, and it went off, which was, of course, the second time that the gun had fired in the course of this episode. The second shot did not hit the wife, and according to her the appellant then went out into the passage, loaded the gun again, returned to the sitting room, accused her of having 'grassed' him, pointed the gun at her from a distance of three or four feet and shot her through the hand which she was holding in front of her body for purposes of protection. In her evidence a before the trial court, the wife maintained that the appellant had deliberately shot the brother-in-law.

The appellant's case was that he had bought the gun about a week before the incident, intending to use it to shoot himself. He said that he had placed the gun in a cupboard loaded and cocked, and when his wife and brother-in-law arrived at the matrimonial home on 13th October he thought he would shoot himself, and he walked into the room carrying the gun with this intention. He said that in the course of the altercation which followed, he was smoking a cigarette and that the cigarette fell from his mouth. Stopping down to pick up the cigarette he said that the gun fired accidentally, and it was this shot which killed the brother-in-law. He then went on to describe how his wife grabbed the barrel of the gun; he tried to repel her but in the course of the struggle the gun fired a second time, and he says that he went into the passage and 'must have loaded the gun' before he returned and fired the third shot.

c At the trial the defence ran three lines; first, provocation; second, diminished responsibility, and, third, accident. It was conceded by counsel for the defence that the verdict on count 1 must at least be manslaughter, and no attempt was made to secure an acquittal on that count.

d The grounds of appeal against conviction in this court are, first, that the learned trial judge erred in law in not severing the indictment and trying the two counts separately, and, secondly, that he similarly erred in allowing the wife of the appellant to give evidence for the Crown in relation to count 1 when she was an incompetent witness for the Crown.

e It is common ground in this court that the wife was a competent witness on count 2 in respect of the attempted murder of herself, but that she was not competent for the prosecution on count 1 except on the application of the person charged. No application was made to sever the indictment, nor was any formal application made by the defence for the wife to be called, though it was suggested in argument that certain advantages accrued to the defence in having the two counts tried together with the wife giving evidence on both.

f Exactly on what basis the trial proceeded is not easy to discover, but at least it is clear that it was accepted by the judge and by both counsel that it should be conducted in the way in which it was, notwithstanding the incompetence of the wife on count 1. No criticism is made of the judge's conduct of the trial in other respects, or of the summing-up, and it can be said at once that if the wife's evidence had properly been admitted the case against the appellant on count 1 would be absolutely overwhelming. Even if one expunges the wife's evidence, and looks at the rest of the case, there was substantial evidence against the appellant on this count. He himself had made a number of admissions, and there was the evidence of a forensic science expert as to the height at which the gun must have been held when the shot which killed Huxley was fired to show that that shot could not have been fired when the appellant was in a kneeling attitude.

h We have accordingly, of course, considered whether this is a case in which it is possible to apply the proviso to s 2 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, on the footing that no miscarriage of justice had actually occurred by reason of the fact that the two counts were tried together and the jury were not given any direction to exclude the evidence of the wife when considering their verdict on count 1. In our view this is not a case in which the proviso can be applied. It is perfectly true that there was a good deal of other evidence on which the jury might well have convicted if the wife had not given evidence, but the wife was the sole eye-witness to the scene, and her evidence that the appellant had deliberately shot at her brother, was evidence of such weight and importance that we cannot bring ourselves to say that the verdict of the jury would have been the same if either the wife had not been called or if they had been given a direction to exclude her evidence when considering their verdict on count 1.

We have no doubt, however, that without the evidence of the wife the jury, if properly instructed, would at least have returned a verdict of manslaughter. The appellant's own evidence goes a long way to show that he was handling the gun in a wholly reckless fashion, and that the killing of the brother-in-law could hardly have been justifiable or excusable homicide in the circumstances. If, therefore, there is power in the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 for us to substitute a verdict of manslaughter on the footing that this is the verdict which the jury must inevitably have reached had the case been tried in accordance with law we should have substituted that verdict. Our difficulty is to find authority within the Act for such a conclusion.

When the court is required to apply the proviso to s 2, it asks itself whether any miscarriage of justice has actually occurred, and if satisfied that there has been no such miscarriage it simply dismisses the appeal. There is no power in s 2 to substitute a verdict for a different offence on the footing that no miscarriage of justice would have occurred if the jury had convicted of that offence.

The power to substitute a verdict for a different offence is to be found in s 3 (1) which reads:

'This section applies on an appeal against conviction, where the appellant has been convicted of an offence and the jury could on the indictment have found him guilty of some other offence, and on the finding of the jury it appears to the Court of Appeal that the jury must have been satisfied of facts which proved him guilty of the other offence.'

The section goes on to provide that in those circumstances a verdict for the alternative offence may be recorded by this court. The basis of the power to substitute a verdict for a different offence must, it is to be observed, be based on the finding of the jury. It is only when it appears to the court from the finding of the jury that the facts essential to establish the alternative offence were proved, that the court may substitute the alternative verdict. Unlike s 2, s 3 (1) does not authorise the court to act on the footing that the court is satisfied that the jury would have brought in the alternative verdict if properly instructed. What is necessary is that the findings of the jury themselves must establish the appropriate facts to support the alternative offence. In the instant case the jury were satisfied that the appellant had murdered his brother-in-law, but we cannot do other than assume that they were influenced in that finding by the wife's evidence. The improper admission of the wife's evidence seems to us to colour the entire findings of the jury, and we are unable to say that the jury found facts appropriate to a verdict of manslaughter, except on the footing that they received support in their finding from the evidence of the wife. It may be that there is a lacuna in the Act, and that this court ought to be given power to substitute a verdict on more general grounds when it is satisfied that the alternative verdict would have been inevitable had the case been properly presented to the jury. But the section taking the form which it does, and there being no reliable findings of the jury on which any conclusion would be based, we are reluctantly compelled to take the view that there is no power for us to substitute a verdict of manslaughter. In these circumstances all that we can do on count 1 is to allow the appeal and quash the conviction. We have not found it possible in this case to say that the wife's evidence was called on the application of the defence, when there was no such application made. Mere silence by the defence in the face of the calling of the wife cannot in our judgment amount to an application for this purpose.

If the jury had returned a verdict of guilty on count 2 there would be no reason for suspecting the validity of that verdict. The wife was undoubtedly a competent witness on that count, and the fact that the indictment was not severed would not be a ground for questioning the validity of the conviction. Unhappily, and for reasons which this court does not understand, the jury's verdict was not taken on count 2, and in those circumstances there is nothing which we here can do to remedy that failure. Whether or not the appellant is now liable to be tried again in regard to the

- a offence alleged in count 2 is a matter which we do not decide. So far as the proceedings before us are concerned we can do no more than quash the conviction on count 1. Insofar as this matter is concerned, of course, the appellant is entitled to be discharged.

Appeal allowed. Conviction on count 1 quashed.

- b 16th April. At the Central Criminal Court counsel for the Crown applied for leave for an indictment to be preferred against the appellant charging him with the attempted murder of his wife (count 2 of the original indictment). Counsel for the appellant, relying on *Connelly v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹, successfully opposed the application, and Talbot J ordered that the trial should not proceed.

It was subsequently detained by an officer of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise from M and then seized by the officer as liable to forfeiture under s 44 (a)^a of the Customs and Excise Act 1952. The officer thereupon preferred a complaint against M, pursuant to s 275^b of, and Sch 7^c to, the 1952 Act, claiming, inter alia, that the bracelet had been found to be of foreign manufacture, that it must therefore have been imported, with the consequence that it was chargeable with customs duty, but that no evidence of payment of duty and purchase tax had been produced by M. M could produce no positive evidence that the bracelet had been manufactured in England but he contended that the onus was on the customs and excise officer to prove that the bracelet was of foreign manufacture.

Held – The question whether the bracelet was of foreign manufacture was, within the meaning of s 290 (2) (b)^d of the Act, a question which concerned the ‘description’ of the goods as alleged in the information and accordingly the onus of proof lay, by virtue of that subsection, on M; as he had failed to show that the bracelet was not of foreign manufacture, it must be condemned as forfeit (see p 1154 e h and j, post).

This was a case stated by his Honour Judge Trapnell and justices for the Inner London Area in respect of their adjudication at the Middlesex Crown Court, on an appeal from the Clerkenwell Magistrates’ Court, on 13th and 18th April 1972.

1. On 13th September 1971 a complaint was preferred by the appellant, Douglas Victor Warren, an officer of customs and excise, against the respondent, George Gershon Mizel, pursuant to s 275 of, and Sch 7 to, the Customs and Excise Act 1952 claiming (a) that a white gold and platinum bracelet was detained from the respondent of 40 Greville Street, London, EC1, (b) that such bracelet was found to be of foreign manufacture and therefore chargeable with duty and purchase tax, (c) that by virtue of s 44 of the Act any imported goods, being goods chargeable with a duty of customs, that were without payment of that duty removed from their place of importation were liable to forfeiture; (d) that on 1st December 1970 the bracelet had been seized as liable to forfeiture because no evidence of payment of duty and purchase tax was produced by the respondent and (e) that the Commissioners of Customs and Excise had ordered proceedings for condemnation of the bracelet pursuant to s 275 of, and Sch 7 to, the Act.

2. The complaint was heard on 10th December 1971 by Christopher Lea Esq, metropolitan stipendiary magistrate sitting at a magistrates’ court at Clerkenwell, who adjudged that the complaint was true and ordered that the bracelet be condemned as forfeit.

3. From that decision the respondent appealed to quarter sessions for the Inner London Area by notice of appeal dated 20th December 1971 on the grounds (a) that the learned magistrate failed to give due weight to the evidence of the respondent and to that of his witnesses; (b) that the decision given was wrong in law.

4. The Crown Court heard the appeal pursuant to the Courts Act 1971 on 13th and 18th April 1972 when they found the following facts. (a) The bracelet had been purchased by the respondent in about 1962 from one William Costello for £925 in England in respect of which Mr Costello gave a receipt dated 20th October 1961. (b) The bracelet was secondhand, of common pattern of poor quality and might have sold retail in a shop for more than the price paid though the possible price range on such a transaction was wide. The present day retail value of the bracelet was assessed by the appellant at £3,452 and by the respondent at about £1,600; no adverse inference was drawn against the respondent from the price he paid or the circumstances in which he purchased it. (c) The bracelet was made of platinum or white

- a gold and diamonds. (d) The bracelet had been detained by an officer of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise from the respondent on 16th November 1970 and was seized by such an officer as liable to forfeiture under s 44 of the Act on 1st December 1970 on the ground (and as was the fact) that no evidence of payment of duty and purchase tax was produced by the respondent. (e) The Commissioners of Customs and Excise had ordered proceedings for the condemnation of the bracelet.
- b (f) There was no evidence that duty or purchase tax were paid on the bracelet. (g) If the bracelet had been imported into the United Kingdom it would have been chargeable with import duty and purchase tax. (h) The Crown Court found it was quite impossible to say whether the bracelet was of foreign or English manufacture. They accepted the evidence tendered by the respondent to that effect and rejected that of the appellant.

- c 5. Evidence was given on behalf of the respondent that the bracelet could be of English or foreign manufacture and that it was not possible to say where it was manufactured. Evidence was given on behalf of the appellant that the bracelet was of Belgian manufacture. There was no positive evidence that the bracelet was made in England.

- d 6. It was contended on behalf of the respondent (i) that the onus was on the appellant to prove that the bracelet was of foreign manufacture and then, if the appellant proved that, the burden passed to the respondent to prove that duty had been paid under s 290 (2) (a) of the Act; (ii) that in this case the appellant had not discharged the onus of showing that the bracelet was of foreign manufacture. Accordingly it was contended that the appeal should be allowed.

- e 7. It was contended on behalf of the appellant (i) that the burden of showing where the bracelet was manufactured did not lie on the appellant but lay on the respondent; (ii) that the Act was concerned with importation and the onus was on the respondent to show that the bracelet was made in England and, if not, that duty had been paid.

- f The Crown Court were referred by counsel for the respondent to the following cases: *Patel v Comptroller of Customs*¹, *Comptroller of Customs v Western Electric Co Ltd*² and *Denton v John Lister Ltd*³.

- g 9. The Crown Court were of the opinion that the fundamental question was where the burden of proof lay to establish the place of manufacture of the bracelet, i.e. whether English or foreign. They considered that (as was contended on behalf of the respondent) the country of origin was different from the country of importation and that, whereas the burden of proving the place from which the bracelet was brought lay on the respondent, there was no such presumption in the case of the country of origin. They concluded, therefore, that the onus of proving that the bracelet was of foreign manufacture lay on the appellant who had failed to discharge that onus. There was no other evidence to show that the bracelet had been abroad and, therefore, at some time imported into this country. The Crown Court accordingly allowed the appeal and awarded the respondent his costs before them and in the magistrates' court.

- j LORD WIDGERY CJ. On 13th September 1971 a complaint was preferred by the appellant an officer of customs and excise, against the respondent pursuant to s 275 of, and Sch 7 to, the Customs and Excise Act 1952 claiming—

3 [1971] 3 All ER 669, [1971] 1 WLR 1426

'(a) that a white gold and platinum bracelet was detained from [the respondent]; (b) that such bracelet was found to be of foreign manufacture and therefore chargeable with duty and purchase tax; (c) that by virtue of section 44 of the Act any imported goods, being goods chargeable with duty of customs that are without payment of that duty, removed from their place of importation are liable to forfeiture; (d) that on 1st December 1970 the said bracelet had been seized as liable to forfeiture because no evidence of payment of duty and purchase tax was produced by [the respondent] and (e) that the Commissioners of Customs and Excise had ordered proceedings for condemnation of the said bracelet.'

The situation underlying the laying of that complaint is that under s 44 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952 it is provided:

'Where—(a) except as provided by or under this Act any imported goods, being goods chargeable with a duty of customs, are without payment of that duty unshipped in any port, unloaded from any aircraft in the United Kingdom, unloaded from any vehicle in, or otherwise brought across the boundary into, Northern Ireland, or removed from their place of importation or from any approved wharf, examination station or transit shed [and I leave out the remaining paragraphs], those goods shall be liable to forfeiture . . .'

The same Act in Sch 7 provides for the procedure to be adopted when an officer of customs and excise seeks to exercise his right of forfeiture, and in brief the schedule provides for the bringing of condemnation proceedings, the first step in which is the laying of a complaint such as that to which I have referred. The white gold and platinum bracelet was undoubtedly detained from the respondent and the appellant officer of customs and excise was seeking by his complaint to justify the forfeiture of the bracelet under the section to which I have referred.

The matter first came before one of her Majesty's metropolitan stipendiary magistrates sitting at Clerkenwell; he having heard such evidence as was put before him adjudged that the complaint was true and ordered that the bracelet be condemned as forfeit.

I go back for a moment to s 44 to remind myself that in order that the complaint be true and that forfeiture shall result, two particular conditions have to be satisfied, first that the goods are imported goods, and secondly that they have been brought into this country without payment of the appropriate duty. We are not told exactly what considerations passed through the mind of the magistrate but he was evidently satisfied that those conditions were present in this case.

From the magistrate's decision the respondent appealed to quarter sessions (now the Crown Court), and it is by way of appeal by case stated from the Crown Court that the matter comes before this court today. When the matter was before the Crown Court in April 1972 they found that the bracelet in question had been bought by the respondent as long ago as 1962 in England, and that the seller had given a receipt dated 20th October 1961. The Crown Court found that—

'the said bracelet was secondhand, of common pattern of poor quality and might have sold retail in a shop for more than the price paid though the possible price range on such a transaction was wide', and they went on to find the present day retail value of the bracelet, a matter which is not of particular relevance to the issue we have to decide. They state as a fact that no evidence was put before them as regards the payment of duty or purchase tax, and they came to consider what in effect is the vital issue in this case, namely whether the bracelet was, as alleged in the complaint, of foreign manufacture.

The reason why that issue is really the dominant issue in the proceedings before us is because if it was of foreign manufacture, then inevitably it had been imported into a this country at some time, whereas if it was not of foreign manufacture there was no ground for saying that it had ever been in any country other than this. Counsel for the appellant leaves us in no doubt that the allegation in the complaint that the bracelet was of foreign manufacture was intended to deal with the important issue of whether as a result it could be considered that the bracelet had been imported at some time.

b On that issue, namely the origin of the bracelet, evidence was called by both parties before the Crown Court. Evidence was called on behalf of the appellant, suggesting that the bracelet was of Belgian origin. Evidence was called on behalf of the respondent which indicated that there really was no basis on which firm conclusion as to its origin could be reached at all. Having heard those two experts, I think the Crown Court preferred the evidence of the expert called by the respondent, and therefore concluded that there really was no firm basis on which the country of origin of this particular piece could be determined, and in these circumstances of course everything turned on the onus of proof.

c The facts which support a forfeiture are importation plus failure to pay duty. If it was for the respondent to prove that the duty had been paid, or alternatively that the bracelet was not of foreign extraction, then he failed to prove it, and consequently the forfeiture was right. On the other hand, if it was for the officer of customs and excise to prove these matters, he had failed to prove them also and so it follows everything really turns in this case on where the onus of proof lay.

d That is dealt with in s 290 of the Act, a provision which has survived more or less in its existing form through a number of versions of this legislation. Section 290 (2) provides:

e 'Where in any proceedings relating to customs or excise any question arises as to the place from which any goods have been brought or as to whether or not—(a) any duty has been paid or secured in respect of any goods; or (b) any goods or other things whatsoever are of the description or nature alleged in the information, writ or other process; or (c) any goods have been lawfully f imported or lawfully unloaded from any ship or aircraft [I omit the next three paragraphs], then, where those proceedings are brought by or against the Commissioners, a law officer of the Crown or an officer [which means an officer of customs and excise], the burden of proof shall lie upon the other party to the proceedings . . .'

g So that reading that section one sees that in the proceedings of the kind which were begun before the magistrate and eventually have come before this court here, where any question arises as to the matters that I have read out, then the burden of proof shall lie not on the customs but on the other party, in this case the respondent.

h Accordingly the task of the Crown Court and in turn our task is to decide whether the matters in issue today are covered by this section or not. If they are then the onus of proof is on the respondent and he must lose; if they are not, the onus is on the customs, and as I see it, they must lose.

j Some time was spent in the Crown Court in considering the opening words of s 290 (2) dealing with the place from which any goods have been brought; but it is obvious to me, and I think is really accepted in argument before us, that that is not the point with which we are concerned today. The argument is concerned with their place of manufacture, because that may give rise to grounds for saying that there has been a subsequent importation. So we are not interested in the place from whence the goods have been brought; we are very much concerned in whether they have been imported in the sense they began life in a foreign country.

So far as para (a) of s 290 (2) is concerned it is quite clear that if the respondent were trying to say that duty had been paid on this piece of jewellery, the onus would clearly lie on him under s 290 (2) (a), and no argument really turns on that. The vital issues are whether in s 290 (2) (b) or (c) the onus lies on him to show that these goods were not of foreign origin. Counsel for the appellant has relied primarily on s 290 (2) (b) which I will read again:

'any goods or other things whatsoever are of the description or nature alleged in the information, writ or other process.'

The question therefore really resolves itself into this: when the complaint in this matter recited as it did that the bracelet was found to be of foreign manufacture, is that a matter of description or nature of the article, because if it is, then it would seem that the onus lies on the respondent in respect of it.

Most of the argument has really turned on the meaning of 'description' in this context. Counsel for the respondent has left us in no doubt, if we were in doubt before, about the consequences which can flow from a wide interpretation of this section. He points out, and for my part I readily accept the value of the comment, that under this section if the customs are right in their argument, anybody in possession of a piece of jewellery or a camera or binoculars or something of that kind can be approached, in theory at any rate, by an officer of the customs and asked whether duty has been paid on the article and if the possessor of the article has no idea whence it came or whether duty has been paid, the onus will be on him to do the impossible, with the result that grave injustice might follow.

I am sure all of us have listened to what counsel for the respondent said with care, and I am much impressed by the consequences which might flow from this extremely wide section if it were exercised in an oppressive way. On the other hand, we must not shrink from accepting that Parliament under its supreme power has determined that the law in regard to customs and excise shall be as laid down in s 290, and if that is the will and intention of Parliament, we in this court have to observe it and support it as much as anybody else. For my part I have come to the conclusion in the end that one cannot say that the reference in this context to the bracelet being of foreign manufacture is other than a matter concerning the description of the goods as alleged in the information. It is abundantly clear that the country of origin will be a vital part of the description of an article in many cases (one need only speak of Havana cigars or wine from Bordeaux); the word is in its natural and ordinary meaning quite wide enough to include the country of origin in the context if this case and I do not find it possible so to restrict the word 'description' as to allow it to apply in this context to the more obvious cases of Havana cigars and prevent it from applying in the instance with which we are now concerned.

I take some comfort from the fact that whatever we say in this case today, many of the difficulties of which counsel for the respondent spoke will still apply, because there will be plenty of people with binoculars, cameras and so on which are obviously of foreign origin, and the difficulties in which they could theoretically be placed if customs officers approached them and insisted on proof of payment of duty are obvious and are not affected by the decision we arrive at today.

My conclusions on the facts of this case is that the onus lay on the respondent, that the judgment of the Crown Court was wrong, and that we should allow the appeal, set aside the decision of the Crown Court and restore the decision of the magistrate.

^c Practice – Place of trial – Adjournment of trial – Adjournment to such place as court thinks fit – Witness – Examination – Witness too infirm to travel to London – Witness fit to be examined at village where she lived – Village not a place authorised for trial of proceedings in Chancery Division – Power of court to adjourn trial to village for purpose of hearing witness's testimony – RSC Ord 33, r 1 – RSC Ord 35, r 3.

^d The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant, claiming a right of way for vehicles over a disputed strip of land at Iken, a small village in Suffolk. The action was tried in the Chancery Division at the Royal Courts of Justice. On day 15 of the trial, after it had been agreed that the judge should view the disputed strip when the evidence had closed, and after some 40 witnesses had been heard, the plaintiffs applied under RSC Ord 39, r 1^a, for an order that one of their witnesses, a Mrs M, be examined on oath at Iken. Mrs M was 84 years old and because of her poor health it was highly undesirable that she should come to London to give evidence; on the other hand she could give evidence at Iken without any real risk or undue distress. The defendant objected to the application on the ground that it had been made too late and further contended that the court had no power to adjourn the trial to Iken under RSC Ord 35, r 3^b, because Iken was not a place authorised as a place of trial under RSC Ord 33, r 1^c, and the Courts Act 1971, s 2^d.

^f Held – (i) In the circumstances it would be better for the court to sit at Iken to hear Mrs M's evidence than to make an order under RSC Ord 39, r 1, for her examination at Iken by an examiner (see p 1158 a b and e, post).

^g (ii) The court had an inherent power to adjourn a trial begun in a place authorised under RSC Ord 33, r 1, to some other suitable place, provided that proper publicity was given to the adjournment; that power was fortified by RSC Ord 33, r 3, empowering a judge to adjourn a trial 'to such place . . . as he thinks fit'; the power was not limited to adjournment to such places as were authorised under RSC Ord 33, r 1 (see p 1158 g to j, post).

^h (iii) In the circumstances it was 'expedient in the interests of justice' that Mrs M's evidence should be taken at Iken and accordingly, at the conclusion of the evidence, the case would be adjourned to Iken for the purpose of hearing her evidence. Any disadvantage to the defendant occasioned by hearing her evidence after the evidence for the defendant would be met by intimating that it would be open to the defendant to make an application to call further evidence to meet Mrs M's testimony (see p 1159 j and p 1160 b to e, post).

Application

The plaintiffs, St Edmundsbury and Ipswich Diocesan Board of Finance and the Parochial Church Council of the Parish of Iken, Suffolk, brought an action against the defendant, Gabriel Bertram Clark, claiming, inter alia, an order that the defendant should forthwith take down and remove all obstructions put up by him on an accessway leading from the highway known as Church Road or Church Lane at Iken to the churchyard and church of the parish of St Botolph, Iken. On 13th April 1973, day 15 of the trial of the action, the plaintiffs applied for the evidence of one of their witnesses, a Mrs Mael, to be taken by an examiner at Iken on the ground that she was too infirm by reason of age and recent illness to travel to London. The facts are set out in the judgment. c

MEGARRY J. It is now for me to rule on an application made by the plaintiffs in the course of a hard-fought and somewhat protracted trial relating to land at Iken, a small Suffolk village lying a few miles inland from Aldeburgh. The real bone of contention between the parties is whether or not there exists the right claimed by the plaintiffs for vehicles to run over a disputed strip of land which lies between a highway and the churchyard at Iken; the right for pedestrians to pass over the disputed strip is not in issue. So far, I have heard nearly 40 witnesses, some of them of advanced years, and today is the sixteenth day of the trial. The point on which I have to rule is whether and in what circumstances the plaintiffs should be able to adduce the evidence of another witness, a Mrs Mael. Counsel for the plaintiffs (whom I may briefly describe as the church authorities) has applied to have Mrs Mael's evidence heard at Iken on the score of her ill-health; and counsel for the defendant has vigorously opposed this application. f

The matter arises in this way. On day 9, 22nd March 1973, counsel for the plaintiffs sought to put in a statement by Mrs Mael under the Civil Evidence Act 1968. He attempted to support his application by a letter which referred to Mrs Mael as being aged 81, and certified that she was 'too infirm by reason of age and recent illness to be safely transported to London and to withstand the rigours of the trial'. Counsel for the plaintiffs accepted that this letter, unsupported by any affidavit which even purported to show that the writer was a registered medical practitioner, was one to which counsel for the defendant was entitled to object as not constituting any evidence of Mrs Mael's unfitness by reason of her bodily condition to attend as a witness; and in any case the letter was wholly lacking in particularity. Counsel for the defendant also challenged the unfitness of Mrs Mael, and said that he wished to cross-examine the writer of the letter. During the argument on this point, I referred to the fact that for other reasons there was going to be an adjournment of a fortnight, during which matters might be agreed or regularised. I also mentioned the fact that as it had already been agreed by both sides that it would be desirable for me to have a view of the disputed strip and its environs, it might be h a possible for me to hear Mrs Mael's evidence at Iken. In the end, counsel for the plaintiffs closed his case subject to any application that he might make with regard to Mrs Mael; and I rejected the application that counsel for the plaintiffs had already made under the Civil Evidence Act 1968 as being insufficiently established, though I noted his words as to a possible future application.

b I heard no more of the matter until I raised it on day 14, 12th April. After some discussion, it was then arranged that the matter should be argued the next morning; and on day 15 it was debated for most of the morning. Counsel for the defendant was critical of the way in which the matter had been dealt with by the plaintiffs, and, in particular, their failure to have Mrs Mael's evidence taken by an examiner in advance of the trial for use in case she proved unable to come to London to testify; and he again challenged the assertion of her unfitness. The plaintiffs then called her doctor, Dr Simpson, a registered medical practitioner, who had written the letter to which I have referred. His evidence was that Mrs Mael was just 84 (the 81 in the letter that I have mentioned seems to have been an error), that she had had an attack of bronchitis at the end of January, that she was now convalescing from it, but that she was unlikely to be better until the warm weather came. His evidence satisfied me that at all material times it was at least highly undesirable from a medical point of view for Mrs Mael to come to London to give evidence, but that she could give evidence in her locality without any real risk or undue distress. Dr Simpson's evidence was clear, frank and specific, and I found it wholly convincing.

d After the evidence had been given, I heard further argument. Initially, when challenged by counsel for the defendant on the score that he had failed to reveal any authority for making such an application, counsel for the plaintiffs had said that his application was made under RSC Ord 39, r 1. This reads as follows:

e '(1) The Court may, in any cause or matter where it appears necessary for the purposes of justice, make an order (in Form No. 32 in Appendix A) for the examination on oath before a judge, an officer or examiner of the Court or some other person, at any place, of any person.

f '(2) An order under paragraph (1) may be made on such terms (including, in particular, terms as to the giving of discovery before the examination takes place) as the Court thinks fit.'

g During the argument I enquired whether to make such an order was the only course open to the court, or whether it would be possible for the hearing before me to be adjourned to Iken for me to hear Mrs Mael's evidence; and the registrar helpfully referred me to RSC Ord 35, r 3. This reads as follows:

'The judge may, if he thinks it expedient in the interest of justice, adjourn a trial for such time, and to such place, and upon such terms, if any, as he thinks fit.'

h Counsel for the defendant then contended that this rule had no application. He said that the words 'to such place' did not mean any place, but only a place authorised for sittings of the High Court under the Courts Act 1971, s 2, and RSC Ord 33, r 1, and that Iken was not such a place, as indeed is the case. His contention was that I had no power to sit as a judge of the High Court at Iken, whereas counsel for the plaintiffs contended to the contrary.

i I pause there. The difference between the two modes of proceedings is marked. RSC Ord 39, r 1, requires an order to be made. The examination is normally in private before an examiner. The examination and cross-examination are duly recorded in depositions or by a shorthand writer; and at the trial of the action the depositions or transcript are then read as part of the evidence. If I made an order under this provision, primarily the order would be that there should be an examination on oath before me, with the depositions or transcript to be filed at the Central Office in accordance with Appendix A, Form 32. The transcript or depositions would then be read to me when the trial was resumed, and thus what previously had been testified merely in private would be made public. a

I may say at once that this procedure seems to me to be quite inappropriate. No doubt it could be modified to some extent, but I really do not see why the evidence should be given in private and then read in public if any better course is available. The examination could, of course, be before an examiner and not before me; but then what I would have would be merely the still life of a transcript instead of the sight and sound of a living witness. b

The alternative course seems to me to be preferable in almost every way. Of course, much judicial time can be saved by taking evidence before an examiner, in place of the judge going to where the witness is; but judicial time is not everything, and here, as I shall in any case be going to Iken to view the site, there would not even be any saving of judicial time. Any objections to the admissibility of evidence, too, could be dealt with forthwith, instead of having to be reserved for subsequent argument on the transcript. Further, the evidence would be given viva voce and in public. The only possible disadvantage that I can see is on the score of expense: the registrar need not be present at an examination or a view, but ought to be present at a sitting of the court, though I understand that the only extra expense to the parties in respect of the attendance of the registrar would be that of his railway fare. As to the presence of a shorthand writer, a hearing before me could in fact effect an economy, in that under RSC Ord 68, r 1, I have power to dispense with the shorthand note, although that, of course, is a matter on which I would hear counsel. Nor would there be any fee to be paid to an examiner. c

The matter stands thus. First, I am satisfied that there is ample medical evidence to justify Mrs Mael not being required to come to London to testify. Second, it seems clear that it would be better for the court to sit at Iken rather than for me to make an order under RSC Ord 39, r 1, for the taking of evidence at Iken by an examiner, whether myself or anyone else. Third, I must then consider whether I have power to sit at Iken for the purpose of hearing Mrs Mael's evidence. Fourth, if I have, I must then consider whether in all the circumstances it would be right for me to exercise the power. e

It seems to me that I have an inherent power to sit at Iken, and that this power is fortified by RSC Ord 35, r 3. I cannot read that rule in the narrow way for which counsel for the defendant contends. I do not think that the power of a judge to adjourn a trial 'to such place . . . as he thinks fit' is confined to an adjournment to only those places which are authorised under RSC Ord 33, r 1. The rule does not say so, and I do not see why it should be implied. Whatever may be the position as to the commencement of a trial, I cannot see that the power of adjournment is fettered. The power, of course, is a power that must be exercised judicially, and doubtless no judge would adjourn a trial to a place which he considered unfit for the purpose: but subject to the place being reasonably fit for the purpose, I regard the power as being unfettered by any such limitation as that for which counsel for the defendant has contended. It is possible, I suppose, that the law is that a trial can be commenced only at an authorised place, although it is unnecessary for me to decide this, and I do not do so. It is important that justice should be done in public, and so trials should no doubt normally be commenced in some place to which the public is accustomed to resort for such purposes. Thus there springs readily to mind the objection to the proceedings for divorce that in 1931 took place before a judge in Alberta in the judges' law library in the law courts, behind closed but not locked doors, one of them bearing the word 'private': *McPherson v McPherson*¹. But if a trial has begun in an authorised courtroom under normal conditions of publicity, I cannot see what objection there is to the trial being adjourned to some other suitable place, provided proper publicity is given to the adjournment. g

- a* Counsel for the defendant founded some argument on RSC Ord 35 being somewhat narrow in its scope. I do not think that it is. It covers a wide range of matters connected with proceedings at a trial, and, indeed, it is r 8 of the order that provides, inter alia, for a judge to inspect any place or thing with respect to which any question arises in the proceedings, a power which it has been agreed that I should exercise. There is ample authority for saying that an inspection by a judge is evidence of what he perceives, even though the inspection takes place outside a courtroom.
- b* Real evidence is real evidence, whether the res is small and portable and is brought to court for the judge to see, or whether it is large or immovable and the judge goes to see it. The process whereby the judge's perception of objects takes place on a view outside the court must, as it seems to me, form part of the trial: and if a judge may leave the courtroom to receive evidence of objects which cannot be carried before him, I do not see why in principle he should not also, while away from the courtroom, receive evidence for a witness too ill to come to court, provided, of course, appropriate safeguards are observed.

Although I have no doubts about my jurisdiction to sit at Iken, I wish if possible to avoid leaving matters in a state in which the contrary might be arguable in a higher court. The Courts Act 1971, s 2, on which counsel for the defendant relied, reads as follows:

- d*
- '(1) Sittings of the High Court may be held, and any other business of the High Court may be conducted, at any place in England or Wales.
- '(2) Subject to rules of court—(a) the places at which the High Court sits outside the Royal Courts of Justice, and (b) the days and times when the High Court sits outside the Royal Courts of Justice, shall be determined in accordance with directions given by or on behalf of the Lord Chancellor.'

Iken is not one of those five places at which sittings of the High Court for the trial of chancery proceedings are at present authorised to be held: see the *Practice Direction*¹. However, I think that one of the objects of the Courts Act 1971 is to facilitate the hearing of cases outside London, and I see no reason why an ad hoc direction should not be given by or on behalf of the Lord Chancellor for the trial of all or part of a particular matter at a particular place if there is sufficient reason for it. I have accordingly caused steps to be taken to obtain such a direction in respect of this case, so that if I consider it proper to hear Mrs Mael's evidence at Iken, there can be no possibility of it being argued that I lack jurisdiction to do so. Accordingly I turn to the fourth and last point, namely, whether it would be right for me to do this.

- g* It seems to me that there is considerable force in counsel for the defendant's objections to the course on this point pursued, or perhaps not pursued, by the plaintiffs. The matter has been left until late in the day, the precaution of obtaining Mrs Mael's evidence before an examiner has not been taken, even though there was ample time and ample warning, and the plaintiffs have dealt with the whole matter in what may with justice be described as a somewhat casual way. Nevertheless, the criterion laid down by RSC Ord 39, r 1, for ordering evidence to be given before an examiner is that it should appear 'necessary for the purposes of justice'. Under RSC Ord 35, r 3, the criterion for adjourning a trial to another place is that it is 'expedient in the interests of justice'. Does justice, then, require that Mrs Mael's evidence should be heard at Iken?

- j* I think it does. The case is unlike *Green v Sevin*², upon which counsel for the defendant relied, in that before counsel for the plaintiffs closed his case he had reserved his right to apply in respect of Mrs Mael's evidence, whereas no such question arose in *Green v Sevin*². Of course, counsel for the plaintiffs could not give himself any right to call the evidence, and the longer he left matters before he made his application, the more ammunition for resisting the application he put into the not unwilling hands of counsel for the defendant. But the suggestion had been made that it might be possible to hear Mrs Mael at Iken on the same day as the view (though this was not accepted by counsel for the defendant), and in any case I cannot see what injustice will be done to the defendant if the evidence is heard, subject to proper safeguards, whereas a real injustice to the plaintiffs may be done if the evidence is shut out. I bear in mind that this is a dispute of long standing in which feelings have run high, and justice is likely to be best served by hearing all the evidence that either side desires to tender, and hearing it in public. I do not consider that it would promote justice to penalise the plaintiffs for their procedural shortcomings by excluding the evidence. Accordingly, I think that counsel for the plaintiffs' application should succeed, and that subject to the terms that I shall mention I should adjourn this case to Iken at the conclusion of the other evidence for the purpose of hearing Mrs Mael's evidence on the same occasion as that on which, by agreement, I exercise my power to hold a view under RSC Ord 35, r 8.

Apart from the place of hearing, the only practical difference in hearing Mrs Mael's evidence in this way is that instead of the defendant being able to hear the whole of the plaintiffs' evidence before calling his own, there will be one witness (out of over 20) whose evidence for the plaintiffs will be given after all the defendant's witnesses have been heard. I think that any disadvantage to the defendant that this may occasion will be amply met by my intimating that if the defendant has any good reason for wishing to call any further evidence to meet Mrs Mael's testimony, whether by recalling a witness who has already testified or by calling further evidence, I will listen to any application for the purpose. The defendant saw a proof of Mrs Mael's proposed testimony weeks ago in connection with the application under the Civil Evidence Act 1968, and it may well be that the defendant will make no application in this respect: but if he does, I shall hear it. I will also, if either side so requires and the arrangements can be made, hear Mrs Mael's evidence before holding the view, so that in this respect her evidence will be in no different case from the other evidence.

The matter is somewhat unusual, and the occasions on which a judge of the Chancery Division has sat outside London have, I believe, been few indeed; I am not now speaking of deputy judges appointed under the Courts Act 1971. At all events, it would not surprise me to hear that no sitting of the High Court has taken place at Iken before. One practical reason for sitting in London is that a high percentage of chancery cases involve questions of law that call for the resources of well-stocked law libraries. Such considerations do not apply, of course, to the mere hearing of evidence: and it may indeed be that in future chancery judges will sit outside London less infrequently. Without for a moment suggesting that it will become common for judges of this Division to sit in temporary accommodation outside the normal authorised places, I think that a degree of flexibility is desirable in cases where there is good reason for relaxing the accustomed ways.

Be that as it may, the unusual circumstances of this case make it appropriate that I should mention certain practical details. The date, time and place of the sitting at Iken will be announced in open court before I adjourn the case for the purpose. The place of hearing will for the time being become a place at which a sitting of the High Court will be taking place, so that the normal provisions relating to sittings of the High Court will apply. A registrar of the Chancery Division will be present in court as is customary.

On the other hand, I think it would be unduly burdensome to all concerned if they were required to be robed in the usual way merely for the purpose of hearing the evidence of one witness; and there may well be difficulties in such matters as the provision of suitable robing rooms. Accordingly, I shall not robe, and I direct that the registrar and counsel shall similarly not be robed. Robes are convenient in

- a normal circumstances as an indication of the functions of those engaged in the proceedings, and as enhancing the formality and dignity of a grave occasion. In their appearance they also lessen visual differences of age, sex and clothing, and so aid concentration on the real issues without distraction. But robes are not essential, and the court may dispense with them where there is good reason. Jurisdiction is neither conferred nor excluded by mere matters of attire or locality, and I need not discuss the numberless occasions on which judges have exercised a variety of judicial functions in unusual places without the aid of robes for them or for counsel, from Lord Lyndhurst LC in a box at the opera to Sir Lancelot Shadwell V-C while bathing in the Thames and Sir Samuel Evans P in a dressing-gown in his bedroom.

Accordingly, on the footing that I have mentioned, I rule that I can and should hear the evidence of Mrs Mael at Iken; and at the appropriate time I shall adjourn the court for this purpose.

Ruling accordingly.

1st May. Following the ruling given on 16th April the court sat in the village hall at Iken and heard the evidence of Mrs Mael. At the sitting of the court the judge stated that a direction on behalf of the Lord Chancellor authorising the court to sit at Iken had been given in a letter dated 18th April 1973 from the Circuit Administrator.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
EDMUND DAVIES LJ, WILLIS AND BEAN JJ
29th MARCH, 17th APRIL, 1st MAY 1973

Customs – Importation of prohibited goods – Knowingly concerned in fraudulent evasion – Importation of drugs – Importation – Meaning – Cannabis – Cannabis sent by air from Nairobi to Bermuda via London – Cannabis unloaded at London airport, transferred to another aircraft and flown to Bermuda – Cannabis not taken outside customs area at London airport – Accused knowing cannabis being sent from Nairobi to Bermuda – Intention merely to use London as pipeline between Nairobi and Bermuda – Whether cannabis ‘imported’ into, and ‘exported’ from, United Kingdom – Customs and Excise Act 1952, ss 44, 45, 56, 79, 304.

A consignment of cannabis was sent by air from Nairobi to Bermuda via London airport. At London airport it was unloaded from an East African aircraft and held within the customs area until it was transferred to another aircraft and flown to Bermuda. S was a party to the arrangement whereby the consignment of cannabis was being sent from Nairobi to Bermuda and knew that the most likely route from Nairobi to Bermuda was via London. A letter referring to ‘the shipment from Bermuda’ and telling him that he could make enquiries about it at London airport was found in S’s possession. He was charged with, and convicted of, being knowingly concerned in a fraudulent evasion of the prohibition against the importation of cannabis, contrary to s 304 (b) of the Customs and Excise Act 1952, and of being knowingly concerned in a fraudulent evasion of the prohibition on the exportation of cannabis, contrary to s 56 (2) of the 1952 Act. He appealed contending (i) that the cannabis had neither been 'imported' into, nor exported from, the United Kingdom within the meaning of the 1952 Act; ss 44^a and 45^b of the Act showed that there was a distinction between merely 'unloading' and 'importing'; and (ii) in any event there was no evidence that S was knowingly concerned in the importation or exportation (if any) of the cannabis; no actus reus on his part in the United Kingdom had been established.

(i) on the true construction of ss 44 and 45 'goods unloaded' could not be excluded from the categories of 'goods imported'; the provisions of the 1952 Act, and in particular s 79^c, showed clearly that goods entering the United Kingdom by air could be 'imported' before they were even unloaded, and the consignment of cannabis was imported when it was landed at London airport, and exported when it was placed on the aircraft bound for Bermuda; it was quite irrelevant to the question of importation that it remained between loading and reloading in the customs area (see p 1167 b to e, post).

(ii) for a person to be convicted of being knowingly concerned in the fraudulent evasion of the prohibition it was sufficient if it was shown that he was a party to the importation of prohibited goods into the United Kingdom as a staging post for their onward transmission to another country (see p 1167 g and h, post);

(iii) there was ample evidence on which the jury could convict S of the offences charged (see p 1167 h, post).

Application

On 4th October 1972 at the Crown Court, London SW3, before Mr Recorder Murray Buttrose and a jury the applicant, Donald Sydney Smith, was convicted on three counts of fraudulently importing cannabis (counts 1, 5 and 12), on one count of fraudulently exporting it (count 13), one count of assaulting a customs officer (count 2) and one count of possessing cannabis (count 3). He was sentenced to a total of 6½ years' imprisonment. The court ordered a recommendation for deportation. The applicant applied for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Cur adv vult

17th April. WILLIS J read the judgment of the court at the request of Edmund Davies LJ. On 4th October 1972 at the Crown Court, London SW3, after a trial

^a Section 44, so far as material, is set out at p 1166 a and b, post

^b Section 45, so far as material, is set out at p 1166 d and e, post

^c Section 79, so far as material, provides: ' . . . (2) The time of importation of any goods shall be deemed to be . . . (b) where the goods are brought by air, the time when the aircraft carrying them lands in the United Kingdom or the time when the goods are unloaded in the United Kingdom, whichever is the earlier . . . '

a lasting seven days, the applicant was convicted on three counts of fraudulently importing cannabis (nos 1, 5 and 12), one count of fraudulently exporting it (no 13), one count of assaulting a customs officer (no 2) and one count of possessing cannabis (no 3). He was sentenced to two years and two years' imprisonment consecutive on counts 1 and 5: one year and one year concurrent but consecutive to the above on counts 12 and 13: six months and nine months both consecutive on counts 2 and 3 respectively. He was, therefore, sentenced to six years and three months in all, with one offence taken into consideration. The applicant was also recommended for deportation and ordered to make a legal aid contribution of £200.

A co-accused, Thompson, was convicted on count 1 and pleaded guilty to count 4 (possessing cannabis) and was sentenced to 18 months and six months consecutive. This made two years in all, and he was recommended for deportation.

c A third man, Sequeira, pleaded guilty to seven counts (nos 1 to 6 and 11) of fraudulently importing cannabis and was sentenced to six months consecutive on each, making $3\frac{1}{2}$ years in all. Pleas of not guilty were accepted on counts 12 and 13. He was then called as a witness for the prosecution against the applicant and Thompson.

The applicant now applies for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence. The facts according to the Crown are as follows.

d Counts 1, 2 and 3

On 10th May 1972 an airmail parcel arrived at Heathrow Airport from Nairobi addressed to Mr D Thomas, 9 Draycott Place, London. It was examined by customs officers on the same day, and found to contain 4,830 grammes of cannabis. On 27th May the parcel was collected from Chelsea sorting office by Thompson, who said he was collecting it on behalf of Thomas. An attempt had been made to deliver e the parcel to the addressee on the previous day. It failed because the landlady said no one of the name of 'Thomas' lived at her house: Thompson, however, was staying there.

Having collected the parcel, Thompson took it to a waiting car of which the applicant was the driver. Both men were then arrested by police officers. When cautioned, Thompson said, 'Yes, all right then. We won't struggle'. The applicant f remained silent, but later at the police station he said to Thompson, 'You didn't know what was in the parcel did you? You were only collecting it for a friend, weren't you?' He gave a false address. When his hotel room was searched a further 114 grammes of cannabis were found (count 3). He admitted it was his and that he used it.

The sender of the parcel was Sequeira, who said that the applicant had introduced g him to a man named Kamel in Nairobi in March 1972 and, when he returned to London in April, had written to ask him (Sequeira) to see Kamel and ask him about certain flight numbers. He did so, and as a result wrote the applicant a letter on 6th May. Kamel gave Sequeira the name and address of Thomas. Sequeira also said that he provided the names and addresses for other parcels of cannabis to be sent, for which service the applicant had offered him £2,000. It was in relation to h parcels sent by Sequeira in accordance with this arrangement that counts 6 to 11 arose. In the letter which the recorder described, with justification, as the key to the whole case on counts 1, 12 and 13, the following passages occur:

i 'As we arranged on the telephone last night I have mailed the gift to Mr Thomas in London . . . I have sent the other parcel to-day by airmail addressed to Mr Thomas so it should be in your hands by next week. Keep your fingers crossed everything will be all right.'

The prosecution said these were references to the parcel.

The letter was found in the applicant's hotel by police and customs officers on 27th May. When he was being interviewed later in the day in his cell by customs officers about the letter and his diary, he snatched the letter from the officer, tried to put both down the lavatory, and, when foiled in that, he contrived to swallow the letter. He also bit the officer's finger and threw him against the wall of the cell. Asked to explain swallowing the letter he said, 'I had to. It made things look bad'.

What had happened was that one customs officer, while questioning the applicant, read the letter aloud to him, a paragraph at a time, while the other officer made notes. The reading had concluded before the letter was snatched and it was reconstructed from the contemporaneous notes. Sequeira in evidence confirmed the substantial accuracy of the reconstruction, as did two police officers who had seen and read the original.

The reverse of the airmail letter read 'Sender Vincent & Maria Sequeira P.O. Box 10723 Nairobi Kenya'. There was an entry in the applicant's diary 'Maria Sequeira P.O. Box 10723'. The applicant said that the diary entry was a Canadian address and at that point snatched the letter.

In his defence on count 1, the applicant said he had known Thompson some ten years, and had met him on 27th May to go shopping. He knew nothing of the parcel collected by Thompson and had no reason for thinking it contained cannabis. He denied Sequeira's evidence about Kamel and the sending of parcels. He admitted receiving the letter of 6th May but said he did not open it or know of its contents until he was shown it in the cell. He said it began 'Hi Don' and not 'Dear Donald' (his name) as the prosecution witnesses averred. He admitted grabbing the letter 'as things looked bad', but said he could not understand what was being said to him on account of the echo in the cell. He denied the assault and said the bite was accidental.

The main prosecution witnesses were George Thomas, who had an off-licence in Birmingham and Mr Gillett, a customs officer. Thomas said that Smith, the applicant, was introduced to him by a mutual friend, as 'John Clark'. In January or February 1972 Clark (Smith) told Thomas he was expecting a parcel and asked if it could be sent to Thomas's address as he was staying at an hotel and did not want it stolen. An attempt by a postman to deliver a parcel addressed to 'John Clark' at Thomas's address failed on 8th February, but on 14th February this parcel, sent by one Masserrias from Kenya, was examined by customs and found to contain 4,820 grammes of cannabis. On 3rd March this parcel was shown by Mr Gillett to Thomas who said he knew Clark and the parcel was very like one which had arrived in mid-February and had been collected by Clark (Smith). He later identified the applicant from 12 photographs as the man he knew as Clark.

In his defence to count 5, the applicant said he had been introduced to Thomas as Donald Smith. He had never used the name Clark, and knew nothing of any parcels delivered to Thomas's address: he denied much of Thomas's evidence and in particular the time of introduction which Thomas at one point in his evidence put as about Christmas 1971, which was manifestly wrong since the applicant was admittedly away from the United Kingdom from November 1971 to 27th January 1972.

Counts 12 and 13

The letter also contained the following passage: 'The shipment to Bermuda went on 2 April on flight EC 772. You can make enquiries about it at BOAC at HEATHROW AIRPORT.' The letter also made clear that there was no way of getting an airmail consignment from Nairobi to Bermuda save via London. Documentary evidence showed that East African Airways flight number EC 772 left Nairobi on 2nd April arriving at Heathrow the same day. On it were three packets described as gifts of material and wood carving, consigned by 'Mr Charles Miller' of Nairobi to 'Mr Michael Seymour' of Bermuda, which on arrival in Bermuda were found to contain 35,334 grammes of cannabis and 13,590 grammes of cannabis resin. The a three packets were in one consignment, on a single airway bill, and were transhipped at London airport on 3rd April on BOAC Flight BA 875. This consignment was the only one in the files of either airline which was consigned from Nairobi to Bermuda via London on the date in question.

At the end of the prosecution case counsel for the applicant made a legal submission that there was no case to go to the jury on counts 12 and 13. This was overruled, and when the applicant gave evidence he denied all knowledge of the consignment, the subject of those two counts.

b In his submission to this court counsel has renewed his argument on counts 12 and 13 which involves a consideration of the appropriate sections of the Customs and Excise Act 1952: he has also made a serious attack on the conduct of the trial by the learned recorder in a number of respects and he further complains of misdirection. It must be said at once that we have taken time to consider our decision solely on the issues which arise as to counts 12 and 13, which raise questions on which the considered judgment of this court was expressly requested by counsel for the Crown. It will be convenient, therefore, to deal first with the other matters of complaint which have been briefly mentioned.

c [His Lordship then outlined the allegations made about the conduct of the trial and complaints of misdirection, reviewed the evidence and concluded:] On counts 1, 2, 3 and 5, therefore, there is nothing to indicate that the applicant did not have a fair trial or that the jury was misdirected. There was abundant evidence on which the jury, properly directed, could convict, and the application on these four counts is, accordingly, refused.

d We pass, therefore, to the real point in this application, namely, the questions arising on counts 12 and 13. Count 12 was laid under s 304 (b) of the 1952 Act, which makes it an offence in relation to any goods to be '... in any way knowingly concerned in any fraudulent evasion of ... prohibition ... applicable to those goods'—in this case the importation of cannabis. Count 13 was laid under s 56 (2) of the same Act, which similarly makes it an offence to export cannabis. Thus the prosecution case was that the consignment was imported into the United Kingdom via the East African aircraft and was exported when it left by BOAC for Bermuda, and that in both these operations the applicant was 'knowingly concerned' in getting the consignment into the United Kingdom and out again in breach of the prohibition.

e It is important to observe that counsel for the applicant concedes that there was evidence on which the jury could find that the parcel was sent from Kenya by the applicant, Kamel and Sequiera acting together, and that the applicant knew that the most likely route to Bermuda was via London. Nonetheless, he submits (1) f that the goods were neither imported into nor exported from the United Kingdom when all that happened was that they were unloaded from one aircraft at Heathrow, remained throughout their stay within the customs area, and were then loaded into another aircraft, and (2) that there was no evidence that the applicant was knowingly concerned in the import or export (if any) despite the concession he felt bound to make on the evidence. He submitted that the evidence went no further h than the establishment of knowledge of the transaction, and participation in its inception in Kenya, but that it fell short of proof of any actus reus on the applicant's part in this country.

i Counsel's first submission on count 12 was to the effect that the goods were merely 'unloaded' at London airport, their ultimate destination being Bermuda and not the United Kingdom, and further that they were not 'goods in transit'. He also questioned, on grounds which were not altogether clear to the court, whether the area of Heathrow where the goods were unloaded, kept and reloaded was part of the United Kingdom for the purposes of the Act. This latter part of the submission we find quite untenable. It was on the distinction which he sought to draw between 'unloading' and 'importing' that counsel really based his first submission, and he relied for this on ss 44 and 45 of the 1952 Act. Section 44, so far as material, reads:

'Where—(a) except as provided by ... this Act any imported goods ... are without payment of ... duty ... unloaded from any aircraft in the United Kingdom ... or removed from their place of importation or from any approved ... transit shed; or (b) any goods are imported, landed or unloaded contrary to any prohibition or restriction for the time being in force ... or (c) ... (d) ... (e) ... (f) ... those goods shall be liable to forfeiture. Provided that where any goods the importation of which is for the time being prohibited ... are on their importation either—(i) reported as intended for exportation in the same ... aircraft [see s 26 (3) (ii)] ... or (ii) entered for transit or transshipment [see s 28 (2) (c)]; or (iii) entered to be warehoused for exportation [see s 28 (2) (b) (d)] ... the Commissioners may, if they see fit, permit the goods to be dealt with accordingly.'

Prohibited goods can, thus, be imported without liability to forfeiture, at the commissioners' discretion, where the ultimate destination is foreign and a temporary accommodation is needed in the United Kingdom.

It is provided by s 45:

'(1) If any person unships or lands in any port or unloads from any aircraft in the United Kingdom ... or removes from their place of importation or from any approved ... transit shed ... (a) any goods chargeable with a duty which has not been paid; or (b) any goods imported, landed or unloaded contrary to any prohibition ... for the time being in force ... with respect to those goods, or ... is otherwise concerned in such unshipping, landing, unloading or removal, or if any person imports or is concerned in importing any goods contrary to any such prohibition ... whether or not the goods are unloaded [then follow the penalties].'

As to s 79 (2) (b) of the Act which provides that the time of importation of any goods shall be deemed to be, where the goods are brought by air, 'when the aircraft carrying them lands in the United Kingdom or the time when the goods are unloaded in the United Kingdom, whichever is the earlier', counsel submits that its purpose is merely to provide an exact time by reference to which budgetary and analogous customs dues can be related or calculated.

Counsel for the Crown has referred us to the scheme of importation in the Act provided by s 26 (report inwards) and s 28 (entry of goods by importer), and to the definition of 'importer' and 'transit goods' in s 307:

'"importer" in relation to any goods at any time between their importation and the time when they are delivered out of customs charge, includes any ... person for the time being ... beneficially interested in the goods.'

'"transit goods" means imported goods entered on importation for transit or transshipment'.

A 'transit shed' is defined by s 17 as being a place approved by the commissioners for the deposit of goods imported but not yet cleared from customs charge, including goods not yet reported and entered. It thus appears that there can be a time when goods are imported and in customs charge earlier than that arising from the normal procedure of reporting inwards and entry under ss 26 and 28.

Counsel for the Crown finally submitted on this aspect of the case that there is no distinction to be drawn between importation on the one hand and unloading on the other, contrary to the contention of counsel for the applicant. He submitted that the proper interpretation of s 45 (i) (b) is that it provides by means of an omnibus form of drafting for all possibilities which may arise in relation to improper importation, and in particular includes the situation where goods are permitted to be imported within the discretion of the commissioners under s 17 or the proviso to s 44

b We do not find s 45 altogether easy to construe, although we think that the approach of counsel for the Crown may well be right. However, it is to be observed that ss 44 and 45 are concerned with the improper importation of goods, and provide by s 44 for the forfeiture of goods improperly imported, and by s 45 for penalties for persons improperly importing. It seems quite clear that the Act contemplates that goods c can be imported before they are either landed from a ship or unloaded from an aircraft. If, as we think, s 79 is not concerned only with budgetary matters, it is plain that goods entering the country by air are imported before they are unloaded, as are goods brought by sea before they are landed. In a fasciculus of sections dealing with the improper importation of goods, whether by evading the payment of duty on customed goods or the prohibition on the importing of prohibited goods, it would be strange indeed for Parliament to have excluded from the various categories of 'goods imported' a category of 'goods unloaded' without such an intention being d precisely indicated. We cannot think that ss 44 (b) and 45 (1) (b) should be construed in the way contended for by counsel for the applicant, namely, as indicating that there can be a category of goods which are simply 'unloaded' and not 'imported' when they are taken off an aircraft at e.g. Heathrow and held in a customs area until reloaded for onward transmission outside the country. It is sufficient to say that in this case we have no doubt that the cannabis in question was imported when the aircraft bringing it landed at Heathrow, and was exported when it was placed on board the BOAC aircraft and that it is quite irrelevant to the question of importation that it remained between unloading and reloading in a customs area.

e We now pass shortly to counsel for the applicant's second submission. It suffices to say that, on the question of the necessary dishonest intent, if the jury accepted (as they undoubtedly did) that the applicant was a party to the importation of cannabis into the United Kingdom as a staging post for its onward transmission to Bermuda, the charges in counts 12 and 13 were fully proved. It was quite unnecessary f to prove that the applicant did anything to further the transaction in this country. This view, we think, receives some support from the two cases to which we have been referred by counsel for the Crown, although neither is exactly in point. In *R v Berner*¹ it was held that exportation did not cease to be prohibited merely because the person taking the goods out of the United Kingdom intended to bring them back. By the same process of reasoning we think that goods deliberately introduced into the United Kingdom are nonetheless imported because the intention is to pass them through this country to another terminus. If this were not so g we cannot think that an argument to the contrary effect would not have been advanced in *Director of Public Prosecutions v Doot*². There is no suggestion in any of their Lordships' speeches that the conspiracy to import cannabis in that case might have been invalidated by the accepted intention to use the United Kingdom simply as a pipeline between Africa and the United States.

h In our view there was ample evidence on which the jury, properly directed as they were, could find that the applicant was knowingly concerned in the fraudulent evasion of the prohibition. The application for leave to appeal against the convictions on counts 12 and 13 likewise is refused.

i As to sentence criticism is made by counsel for the applicant only of those on counts 2 (assault) and 3 (possessing cannabis), which he submits are excessive. The applicant is 36 and has a number of convictions in Bermuda, including more than one for violence. This court can find nothing wrong in principle with the sentences imposed and they are certainly not excessive. This application is, therefore, also refused. a [1st May 1973. The court considered an application for leave to appeal to the House of Lords.]

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. On 4th October 1972 Donald Sydney Smith was convicted inter alia on counts 12 and 13 of an indictment alleging fraudulent importation and exportation of cannabis, contrary to ss 304 (b) and 56 (2) respectively of the Customs and Excise Act 1952. He applied for leave to appeal against his conviction and sentence on those two counts and indeed on other counts to which it is not necessary for us to refer. On 17th April we purported to dismiss his application for leave to appeal, but as a question of law was involved in the conviction on those two counts, the proper order that we should have made was to grant leave to appeal against conviction and to proceed with the substantive appeal. Immediately this was realised, we gave directions that the order of this court should not be drawn up, and it has not been. b

We now grant the application for leave to appeal against the conviction of the applicant on counts 12 and 13, and with the concurrence of counsel for the applicant we treat the hearing before us as the hearing of the appeal itself. For the reasons given in the judgment of the court delivered by Willis J, we dismissed the appeal against conviction on all counts in the indictment including of course counts 12 and 13, and as he stated, the application in relation to sentences is refused. c

He now applies under s 33 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 for the certificate of this court that a point of law of general public importance is involved in the decision, and for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against this court's decision dismissing his appeals in respect of the convictions under counts 12 and 13. We certify that the following points of law of general public importance are involved in our decision relating to those two convictions: d

'If goods, the subject of prohibitions upon importation into and exportation from the United Kingdom, are sent by air mail from Kenya to Bermuda, and the goods are in fact flown to London (Heathrow) Airport in the United Kingdom and without leaving the customs security area are there transferred to another aircraft and flown to Bermuda: (a) are such goods "imported" into the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Customs and Excise Act 1952? and (b) are such goods "exported" from the United Kingdom within the meaning of the said Act.' e

But, having certified, we refuse leave to appeal to the House of Lords, leaving the appellant to take such course thereafter as he thinks appropriate. f

We are grateful to counsel for the assistance they have given us in framing the question we have certified. g

Application for leave to appeal against convictions on counts 1, 2, 3 and 5 dismissed. Application for leave to appeal against conviction on counts 12 and 13 granted; appeals dismissed. Application for leave to appeal against sentence dismissed. h

The court having certified that points of law of general public importance were involved in its decision in relation to counts 12 and 13, leave to appeal was refused. i f The appellants were a company which manufactured amusement machines. They supplied the machines to an associated company for sale to retailers and operators. Up to July 1967 the appellants had paid purchase tax calculated on a formula agreed in 1964 with the Commissioners of Customs and Excise as to the wholesale value of the machines. On 31st July 1967, however, the appellants' solicitors wrote to the commissioners challenging the 1964 agreement. Their letter stated that they had advised the appellants that the amount of tax payable under the agreement was incorrect, and that the amount correctly payable was less; and it asked the commissioners to accept the appellants' cheque for some £30,000 enclosed with the letter as paid to the commissioners by way of deposit, and to regard the letter as a request for a reference to arbitration under the Purchase Tax Act 1963. For the next 2½ years the commissioners sought to fix the wholesale value of the machines; they investigated the appellants' affairs and obtained information from their customers. h That information was given voluntarily but the commissioners were empowered by s 24 (6) of the 1963 Act to compel its disclosure when necessary. Eventually, in a letter dated 8th December 1969, the commissioners, in accordance with s 3 of the 1963 Act, gave their opinion as to the wholesale value of the machines in respect of which the appellants were accountable for purchase tax during the period 1st April 1967 to 31st December 1968. The appellants objected to the commissioners' i assessment of the wholesale value and duly served notice under s 36 of the 1963 Act requiring a reference to arbitration. Pleadings were delivered by the appellants contesting the commissioners' assessment. The commissioners put in a defence disputing the appellants' contentions and made an affidavit of documents in which they claimed privilege in respect of a large number of documents listed in three classes. The privilege was claimed for (class 2 (a)) communications between the commissioners and their solicitor to obtain advice; (class 2 (b) (i)) communications between the commissioners and their solicitor in anticipation of litigation so as to provide evidence and information for the arbitration; (class 2 (b) (ii)) memoranda, notes, minutes, correspondence, reports and schedules passing between the commissioners and their officers, servants and agents, and between the commissioners' officers, servants and agents, which had been prepared, sent or received confidentially for the purpose of obtaining or furnishing information and evidence for the purposes of the arbitration during the period (i.e. from 31st July 1967) when, in the commissioners' view, the arbitration was contemplated or pending; (class 2 (c)) documents received from third parties in confidence as information and evidence for the purposes of the arbitration; those documents were described in the affidavit as orders, invoices, confidential price lists, credit notes, extracts from ledgers, correspondence between third parties, agreements between third parties, and information supplied to the commissioners by persons other than the appellants relating to the purchase and sale of amusement machines manufactured by the appellants at a time when arbitration between the appellants and the commissioners was contemplated or pending. The commissioners claimed that all the documents listed were the subject of legal professional privilege and further that disclosure of documents listed in classes 2 (b) and (c) would be contrary to the public interest. Forbes J^a dismissed the commissioners' claims but, on appeal, the Court of Appeal upheld the claims for legal professional privilege in respect of classes 2 (a) and (b) and upheld the claim for privilege in respect of class 2 (c) on the ground that they were copies of documents belonging to third parties which had been entrusted to the commissioners in confidence for the purposes of the litigation. On appeal by the appellants it was not disputed that the class 2 (a) documents were the subject of legal professional privilege.

Held – (i) The commissioners were entitled to claim legal professional privilege in respect of documents in class 2 (b) (i) even if, which was doubtful, the existence of privilege depended on the reference to arbitration having been anticipated when they were written, for the commissioners had, on the receipt of the letter of 31st July 1967, formed the reasonable view that any value which they fixed would almost certainly be challenged and there was nothing in the subsequent correspondence to make them think otherwise (see p 1172 f, p 1175 b, p 1182 d and e and p 1185 f, post).

(ii) (Viscount Dilhorne dissenting) The commissioners were not however entitled to claim legal professional privilege in respect of classes 2 (b) (ii) and 2 (c). Although it might be the case that privilege could be claimed for documents which had been produced for two quite separate purposes, one of which was the submission of the information contained therein to a legal adviser for advice in the event of a claim being made by a third party, the documents in classes 2 (b) (ii) and 2 (c) were not in that category; the two purposes for which they had come into existence were parts of a single wider purpose, i.e. the ascertainment of the wholesale value of the appellants' goods, the sole immediate purpose being to help the commissioners to fix what in their opinion was the true value. The mere fact that the commissioners knew that their opinion might be challenged did not itself enable them to claim that the documents were the subject of privilege. The documents had first to be used by the commissioners to enable them to form an opinion as to value before arbitration proceedings became possible and before their solicitor would use them for the purpose of defending their opinion in the anticipated arbitration (see p 1172 f, p 1183 g to p 1184 c and p 1185 f, post); Jones v Great Central Railway Co [1919] AC 4 applied; Ogden v London Electric Railway Co [1933] All ER Rep 896 and Seabrook v British Transport Commission [1959] 2 All ER 15 distinguished.

- a* (iii) There was no basis for a claim to privilege in respect of the class (2) (c) documents on the ground that they were documents, or copies of documents, which belonged to third parties and had been entrusted to the commissioners in confidence. Privilege against disclosure could not be claimed on the ground that documents, whether confidential or not, belonged to a third party and the confidential nature of a document was not itself a ground of privilege (see p 1172 f, p 1180 j, p 1181 b and c, p 1182 b and p 1185 f, post); Enthoven v Cobb (1852) 2 De GM & G 632 distinguished.
- b* (iv) The commissioners were however entitled to claim 'Crown' privilege, i.e. privilege on the grounds of public interest, in respect of documents in classes 2 (b) (ii) and 2 (c). Although 'confidentiality' was not a separate head of privilege, it might be a very material consideration to bear in mind when privilege was claimed on the ground of public interest. In the circumstances there was a strong possibility that the third parties who had supplied the information to the commissioners because of the existence of their statutory powers would very much resent its disclosure by the commissioners to the appellants and it was not at all fanciful to say that knowledge that the commissioners could not keep such information secret might be harmful to the efficient working of the 1963 Act. Accordingly, although the considerations for and against disclosure were fairly evenly balanced, the courts should uphold the claim to privilege on the ground of public interest and trust the head of the department concerned to do what he could to mitigate the ill-effects of non-disclosure. The appeal would therefore be dismissed on that ground (see p 1172 f, p 1175 b, p 1184 d to f and p 1185 c to f, post); Norwich Pharmacal Co v Commissioners of Customs and Excise p 943, ante, distinguished.

Appeal

Alfred Crompton Amusement Machines Ltd appealed against an order of the Court of Appeal¹ (Lord Denning MR, Karminski and Orr LJ) dated 17th February 1972 allowing the appeal of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise against an order of Forbes J¹ dated 15th July 1971 whereby it was ordered that the commissioners file an affidavit specifying which of the documents contained in bundles A to G referred to in Part 2 of Sch 1 to an affidavit of documents, sworn by Sir Louis Petch, the chairman of the Board of Customs and Excise, on 23rd April 1971, were communications passing between the commissioners and their solicitors for the purpose solely of obtaining or giving legal advice or assistance, and that the commissioners produce immediately thereafter the remaining documents contained in bundles A to G. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Cross of Chelsea. b

4th July. The following opinions were delivered. e

LORD REID. My Lords, I would dismiss this appeal for the reasons given by my noble and learned friend, Lord Cross of Chelsea. f

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, I have had the advantage of considering the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Cross of Chelsea, and for the reasons which he gives I would dismiss this appeal.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, by the Purchase Tax Act 1963, purchase tax was chargeable on the wholesale value of the goods to which the Act applied. The wholesale value was by s 3 to be taken to be the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, the goods would fetch on a sale made at the time the tax became due by a person selling by wholesale in the open market in the United Kingdom to a retailer carrying on business in the United Kingdom only if no tax were chargeable in respect of the sale and it were made in the circumstances specified in Sch 2 to the Act. g

If the trader desired to dispute the commissioners' opinion as to the wholesale value, he had within the prescribed time, or within such further period as might be allowed, to give notice requiring a reference to arbitration under s 36 (1) to the commissioners (s 36 (2)). h

The course of events in this case did not follow the pattern envisaged by the Act. Indeed, in the vast majority of cases it did not. In most cases the commissioners and the trader were able to reach agreement as to the wholesale value and tax was levied in accordance with the agreement and without the commissioners giving an j a opinion under s 36 (2). In such cases the figure agreed on or a formula agreed on to determine the wholesale value were to be taken as expressing the commissioners' opinion of the value or their agreement that the formula would produce a figure which was in their opinion the value.

Only when agreement could not be reached, was it necessary for the commissioners to give a formal opinion and then the trader could, if he wished to dispute it, give notice requiring a reference to arbitration.

b In this case the appellants and the commissioners initially agreed a formula, the application of which would determine the wholesale value of the machines produced by the appellants. It was—

c 'the value basis of total selling price including service charge, less any freely available cash discount less the included purchase tax, less an allowance of 17½% to cover retailing and servicing, plus delivery and insurance.'

On 31st July 1967 the appellants' then solicitors wrote to the commissioners saying that they had advised the appellants that neither they nor the appellants' consultant accountant were satisfied that they were paying the correct amount and considered that the amount properly payable was less. They mentioned a reference to arbitration.

d The appellants, however, continued to pay the tax due under the 1964 formula and it was not until 11th September 1968 that their solicitors wrote asking the commissioners to treat their letter as formal notice under s 36 of the Act requiring a reference to arbitration. They had also mentioned a reference to arbitration in letters dated 1st and 2nd August 1968.

e It was clear, therefore, from 31st July 1967 that the appellants were challenging the correctness of the 1964 formula on the ground that it produced too high a figure for the wholesale value.

On receipt of this letter the commissioners investigated the matter and in so doing made use of their powers under s 24 (6) of the Act to obtain information from the appellants and also from persons concerned with the purchase of goods from them. As a result of the information they obtained, they came to the conclusion that the formula agreed in 1964 produced too low a figure. From the moment they received the letter of 31st July 1967, they anticipated that there would be a reference to arbitration.

f They did not give their formal opinion on the wholesale value until 8th December 1969. The appellants' solicitors' request that their letter of 11th September 1968 should be treated as notice requiring a reference to arbitration was therefore premature and inappropriate as were the mentions of a reference to arbitration in the letters of 31st July 1967, and 1st and 2nd August 1968.

g The letter of 11th September was, nevertheless, treated as notice requiring a reference and in their statement of claim the appellants challenged the commissioners' opinion and claimed a deduction of 17½ per cent or of 12½ per cent from the gross tax inclusive price of each machine sold by them in respect of after sales service and also a deduction of 33½ per cent or such percentage as the referee might find appropriate from their sale price exclusive of purchase tax in respect of a retailer's margin. The commissioners in their defence denied this and, for reasons it is not necessary to state, maintained that their opinion was correct.

h On discovery the commissioners objected to producing a large number of documents and, at the hearing of the appeal in this House, it was contended on their behalf that they were entitled to do so on two grounds (1) that the documents were protected by legal privilege and (2) by what is commonly, though inaptly, called Crown privilege.

i In respect of litigation, legal professional privilege cannot be claimed for documents which come into existence prior to the date when litigation can reasonably be anticipated. If here the commissioners had merely been asked to give their opinion as the Purchase Tax Act 1963 required them to do and there had been no prior threats of arbitration, the commissioners could not have reasonably anticipated litigation until after 8th December 1969, when they gave their opinion and presumably not until the appellants had given notice requiring arbitration. But here the appellants made it clear that they wanted a reference to arbitration more than two years before the commissioners' opinion was given, and I agree with Lord Denning MR, Karminski and Orr LJ¹ and Eveleigh J² that, owing to the conduct of the appellants, the commissioners were entitled reasonably to anticipate litigation on receipt of the letter of 31st July 1967. As Karminski LJ said³:

'... there was a definite prospect of litigation between the parties from the end of July 1967. There was a faint possibility that the differences between the parties might be adjusted, but the probability of litigation between them was strong.'

Indeed, unless the commissioners were prepared to value the appellants' machines at less than the figure the 1964 formula produced, or the appellants abandoned their contentions, litigation was certain.

The commissioners from that date anticipated that there would be an arbitration. In the circumstances of this case that was a reasonable conclusion. The finding that from 31st July 1967 onwards the commissioners reasonably anticipated that there would be an arbitration is, in my opinion, crucial in relation to their claim for legal professional privilege.

The documents which the commissioners claim are covered by legal professional privilege, came into existence in the course of the investigation. They had a dual purpose, to enable the commissioners to form their opinion and for the use of their solicitors whose task it was to secure the material necessary for the arbitration, to advise thereon and to prepare the commissioners' case.

Where an event occurs which is likely to lead to litigation, e.g. an accident on a railway, it has long been established that reports made in anticipation of litigation and for the use of the defendant's solicitors are protected, and that the reports need not be made solely or primarily for the use of the solicitors (*Ogden v London Electric Railway Co*⁴; *Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Co Ltd v London and North Western Railway Co*⁵). So the fact that the documents come into existence for a dual purpose does not deprive them of protection if one purpose is their use by solicitors when litigation is reasonably anticipated.

In this case there could not, however, be any litigation until after the commissioners had stated their opinion. Does that make any difference? I think not. If one accepts that on receipt of the letter of 31st July 1967 the commissioners were justified in anticipating that there would be litigation, then, in my view, it matters not that the foundation of that litigation, the commissioners' opinion, occurred much later. If it were otherwise, legal professional privilege could not apply to documents which come into existence when a quia timet action was contemplated.

I do not think that *Jones v Great Central Railway Co*⁶ is at all analogous. There a member of a trade union furnished his union with information to enable the union to decide whether to support an action by him for wrongful dismissal and whether to give him the assistance of their solicitor. It was held that the letters containing the information sent to the union by the member were not protected by legal professional privilege. In that case when the letters were written, litigation a was not anticipated. It might ensue but whether it did or not depended in the first place on the decision of the union. Here the documents in question came into existence after litigation was reasonably anticipated and for the use of the solicitors.

It is for these reasons that I am unable to agree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Cross of Chelsea, which I have had the advantage of reading, on the first issue in this appeal. In my opinion, the documents in question are protected by legal professional privilege.

b With his observations on what may be called the Crown privilege issue, I entirely agree and have nothing to add.

In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed.

c LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, under s 1 (1) of the Purchase Tax Act 1963 purchase tax is charged on the wholesale value of chargeable goods which are purchased from or appropriated by persons required by the Act to be registered. Section 2 (1) provides that the wholesale value of any goods in respect of which tax is chargeable shall be taken to be the price which in the opinion of the commissioners the goods would fetch on a sale made at the time when the tax in respect of the goods became due by a person selling by wholesale in the open market in the United Kingdom to a retail trader carrying on his business in the United Kingdom only, if no tax were chargeable in respect of the sale and it were made in the circumstances specified in Sch 2. Section 36 provides that if any dispute arises as to the wholesale value of any goods then if the person accountable for the tax gives notice within the prescribed period requiring a reference to arbitration and deposits with the commissioners the amount of tax payable on the basis of their opinion the dispute as to value shall be referred to an arbitrator appointed by the Lord Chancellor whose decision shall be final and conclusive. Under the regulations made under the Act the registered wholesaler makes quarterly returns of his sales. References to arbitration are rare. In the vast majority of cases the wholesale value on which tax is chargeable is agreed between the taxpayer and the commissioners. When the commissioners accept a payment in respect of tax calculated in accordance with such an agreement they must, I think, be taken to be expressing their opinion that the wholesale value on which tax is being paid for the quarter in question has been correctly ascertained even though they do not say so in terms. A formal expression of their opinion is only required when the taxpayer disputes it and wishes the matter to be referred to arbitration.

d The appellants manufacture amusement machines which they sell through their 'sales' company, Alfred Crompton Ltd. They claim that in the main the sales are made directly to 'consumers'—i.e. to those who run amusement arcades or cafes and instal machines in them—and not to retailers who sub-sell them or hire them out to consumers. It follows, they say, that it is not right to treat the price at which they sell a machine as the 'wholesale price', but that some deduction should be made for it in respect of what is called the 'retailers' margin'. In 1964 the appellants and the commissioners agreed a formula by reference to which the purchase tax should be calculated. It was—

'total selling price including service charge, less any freely available cash discount less the included purchase tax, an allowance of $17\frac{1}{2}\%$ to cover retailing and servicing, plus delivery and insurance.'

j The appellants paid tax and the commissioners accepted tax calculated in accordance with that formula down to the end of the first quarter of 1967. It appears that in 1963, before the appellants started to trade and when the business was still carried on by Mr Crompton himself, a Mr Tuckwell, who was his consultant accountant, negotiated an agreement with the commissioners in respect of a machine called the 'Six-way' machine under which as well as the deduction of $17\frac{1}{2}\%$ per cent for the retailer's margin Mr Crompton was allowed a further deduction of £135 per machine in respect of the 'servicing' of the machine after delivery. Mr Tuckwell had nothing to do with the negotiating of the 1964 agreement but later when he became consultant accountant to the appellants he took the view that the 1964 agreement was too favourable to the commissioners because it allowed no deduction for 'servicing'. So on 31st July 1967 the appellants' solicitor wrote to the commissioners a letter in the following terms:

'We enclose herewith the following:—(1) Form P.T. 11 relating to Alfred Crompton Amusement Machines Ltd. (2) Form P.T. 11 2/67 (A.D.P.) relating to Alfred Crompton Development Co. Ltd. (3) Cheque for £30,254.15.11d. drawn on Alfred Crompton Amusement Machines Limited. We have advised our Clients that neither we, nor the Companies Consultant Accountant, are satisfied that this is the correct amount payable, but consider that the amount correctly payable is, in fact, less. We should, therefore, be glad if you would consider this sum as paid to you by way of deposit. If an assessment has been made pursuant to the Finance No. 2 Act 1940 Section 21, we should be glad if you would regard this letter as a request for a reference to the Referee.'

The reference to s 21 of the Finance Act 1940 was clearly a mistake for s 36 of the Purchase Tax Act 1963. In fact, so far as I can see, there was no need for the appellants—at this stage—to have requested a reference or deposited the tax for the quarter ending 31st July calculated on the 1964 basis. All that they needed to have done was to say that they were no longer prepared to go on paying tax on the 1964 formula because it made no deduction for servicing and to have put in a return on what they claimed was the right basis. It was only if no agreement on the point could have been reached that they would have needed to invite the commissioners to give a formal opinion which they could challenge in arbitration proceedings. If they had taken that course the present dispute so far as it relates to the claim to 'legal professional privilege' might well never have arisen.

On receipt of the letter of 31st July 1967 the commissioners embarked on a prolonged investigation of the whole position in the course of which they invoked the powers given to them by s 24 (6) of the 1963 Act which runs as follows:

'Every person concerned with the purchase or importation of goods, or with the application to goods of any process of manufacture, or with dealings with imported goods, shall furnish to the Commissioners, within such time and in such form as they may require, such information relating to the goods, or to the purchase or importation of them, or to the application of any process of manufacture to them, or to dealings with them, as they may specify, and shall, upon demand made by any officer or other person authorised in that behalf by the Commissioners, produce any books or accounts or other documents of whatever nature relating thereto for inspection by that officer or person at such time and place as that officer or person may require.'

On 6th December 1968 they served on the appellants a notice under the subsection calling on them to produce for inspection, inter alia, all books accounts and other documents relating to machines which they had sold since 1st April 1967; but also—what is more important—they made enquiries of a number of those who had purchased Crompton machines and obtained from them documents and information relating to the terms on which they bought the machines and how they had dealt with them. It appears that this information from third parties was obtained 'voluntarily' in the sense that notices under the subsection were not served on them, but no doubt those concerned knew that the commissioners possessed statutory powers enabling them to compel its disclosure and the fact that no notices were served appears to me to be irrelevant.

a As a result of their investigation the commissioners—rightly or wrongly—formed the opinion that the appellants ought not to be treated as wholesalers supplying directly to consumers but as wholesalers supplying to retailers. Accordingly, in their formal opinion which they gave on 8th December 1969, they fixed the wholesale value for the purpose of purchase tax of the appellants' machines sold from 1st April 1967 to 31st December 1968, on the basis that the appellants were not entitled to any deduction either in respect of retailers' margin or in respect of after sales service. The appellants disputed the correctness of this opinion and the matter was duly referred to arbitration. The amount of tax in dispute is some £100,000. b In their statement of claim delivered on 19th March 1970, the appellants maintained their contention that they sold in the main to consumers and provided an after sales service the cost of which should be taken to be included in the price, and claimed a deduction of 33½ per cent for retailers' margin and of 12½ per cent for the after sales service. c By their defence delivered on 16th April 1970, the commissioners denied that the appellants supplied machines directly to operators or that they provided an after sales service. One of the reasons which they gave as justifying their opinion as to value ran as follows:

d '5 (h) In determining the wholesale value of the said chargeable goods as set out in their said opinion the [commissioners] were entitled to and did rely upon the gross tax inclusive prices shown in the current price List of Alfred Crompton Limited and the discounts allowed by Alfred Crompton Limited on sales by the Company of chargeable goods sold or transferred to that company by the [appellants] to customers in the United Kingdom who were, in respect of the transactions taken into account by the [commissioners], in the equivalent position to a retailer.' e f '(b) Of the alleged sales by Alfred Crompton Ltd., of chargeable goods to customers in the United Kingdom who were, in respect of the transactions taken into account by the [commissioners], in the equivalent position to a retailer, identifying and giving full particulars of each and every sale, customer and transaction referred to; stating how and to what extent each of the alleged transactions was taken into account by the [commissioners]; and stating what is meant by the allegation that the said customers were in the equivalent position to a retailer and the facts and matters relied on in support of this allegation in relation to each such customer.'

g This request was answered as follows:

h '(b) Inquiries made by the [commissioners] in relation to sales of Alfred Crompton Limited of the said machines have disclosed in particular cases the fact that certain of the customers of Alfred Crompton Limited were purchasing the said machines from, and with the knowledge of, Alfred Crompton Limited for the purpose of resale to individual end users of the same and it is these transactions upon which the [commissioners] rely as alleged. Full details of the said transactions are contained in the records of Alfred Crompton Limited i.e. the order files and invoices and will appear on discovery herein.'

j In their list of documents served on 5th June 1970, the commissioners claimed privilege for a large number of documents on the ground in some cases of legal professional privilege and in others of what used to be called 'Crown privilege'. On a summons taken out by the appellants Eveleigh J¹, on 8th March 1971, held that privilege had not so far been properly claimed and directed the commissioners, if they wished to maintain their claim, to file a further affidavit which would show with greater particularity what privilege was claimed for what sorts of document and on what grounds. As a result of that order the commissioners disclosed a number of documents for which they had previously claimed privilege and, on 23rd April 1971, Sir Louis Petch, their chairman, swore a further affidavit claiming privilege for the documents enumerated in Part 2 of the schedule, which was in the following terms:

(a) Communications between the [commissioners] and their solicitor in his professional capacity and instructions to and opinions of and documents settled by Counsel for the purpose of obtaining or giving legal advice or assistance: and

(b) (i) Communications passing between the [commissioners] their officers, servants and agents and [commissioners'] solicitor when arbitration between the [appellants] and the [commissioners] was contemplated or pending, the same having been prepared sent or received confidentially for the purpose of obtaining for or furnishing to the said solicitor information or evidence to be used in such arbitration, or information as to the evidence which could be obtained, or otherwise for the use of the said solicitor, to enable him to conduct, and/or advise the [commissioners] their officers servants or agents in relation to, the said arbitration: and

(ii) Memoranda, notes, minutes, correspondence, reports and schedules passing between the [commissioners] and their officers servants and agents and between the [commissioners] officers servants and agents at a time when arbitration between the [appellants] and the [commissioners] was contemplated or pending, the same having been prepared sent or received confidentially for the purpose of obtaining or furnishing information and/or evidence with reference to and for the purposes of the said arbitration.

(c) Orders, invoices, confidential price lists, credit note, extracts from ledgers, correspondence between third parties, agreements between third parties and information supplied to the [commissioners] by persons other than the [appellants] relating to the purchase and sale of amusement machines manufactured by the [appellants] at a time when arbitration between the [appellants] and the [commissioners] was contemplated or pending the same having been obtained and received by the [commissioners] confidentially for the purpose of obtaining information and/or evidence with reference to and for the purpose of the said arbitration.'

The members of the Court of Appeal inspected the documents referred to in 2 (b) (ii) and (c), which are described by Lord Denning MR as follows¹:

'On inspecting these documents in 2 (b) (ii) it appears that they are all internal memoranda within the department itself made in the course of their investigations. There are instructions issued by senior officers to the staff about the methods to be employed. There are many schedules prepared by the staff showing the prices charged for machines. There are many minutes of meetings which were had by the staff of the commissioners with the staff of the company, or its accountants and solicitors. There are memoranda containing comments on the attitude and conduct of the company and its advisers... Our inspection of the documents in bundle 2 (c) shows that they are all documents which emanated from third parties. Cromptons used to supply machines to third parties (who were retailers), and these retailers supplied them to the operators in the arcades. These third parties issued invoices to their customers, including Crompton machines, and price lists including them, also hire-purchase agreements and so forth. All of these documents were material in the investigation as to "wholesale value", because they would go to show the retailers' margin.'

a It was common ground before us that the documents listed in 2 (a) are the subject of legal professional privilege. The commissioners claim that the documents listed in 2 (b) and (c) are also entitled to privilege on the same ground. Alternatively that their disclosure would be contrary to the public interest. The case for saying that they are covered by legal professional privilege is set out in para 16 of the affidavit of Mr Fletcher, a principal in the valuation division, sworn on 6th October 1970, and b para 15 of a second affidavit sworn by him on 13th May 1971. At the time when the first affidavit was sworn the commissioners were not yet claiming that legal professional privilege applied to the documents in 2 (c) but, although by the time that the second affidavit was sworn the claim had been extended to the 2 (c) documents, para 15, which is substantially to the same effect as para 16 of the earlier affidavit, appears still to relate only to the 2 (b) documents. What is said may be summarised as follows. When the commissioners received the letter of 31st July 1967, they took c the view that any opinion which they might express as to value would be disputed by the appellants and referred to arbitration—a view which was, in fact, confirmed by the repeated references to arbitration in subsequent correspondence. Accordingly, the valuation department at once acquainted the legal department with the facts of the case and the investigation leading up to the giving of the formal opinion as to value was conducted under the supervision of that department. The legal officers d of the commissioners gave advice as to the nature of the material to be collected and methods to be employed. All of the documents in question were prepared in the knowledge, and had as one of their important purposes, that they would in due course be the subject of advice from the legal officers in connection with the arbitration and would be used by such officers in preparing the commissioners' case in the arbitration.

e The grounds for the claim that the disclosure of the 2 (b) and (c) documents would be contrary to the public interest are contained in a certificate by Sir Louis Petch given on 6th October 1970, and an affidavit sworn by him on 14th May 1971, which repeats and somewhat amplifies them. The grounds alleged in respect of the 2 (b) documents are, briefly stated, (1) that such documents or some of them disclose the f methods of enquiry adopted by the commissioners in cases of this kind, (2) that such documents or some of them make reference to information obtained from some traders with regard to the trading practices of other traders—in particular those of the traders whose affairs are being investigated—that such information is sometimes discreditable to the trader concerned and that if it were known that it was liable to be disclosed the informants would no longer give the information and in any case the commissioners' staff would hesitate to receive it or comment on it, (3) that many of g the 2 (b) documents contain or are based on the information contained in the 2 (c) documents and that if it is contrary to the public interest that the latter be disclosed it must follow that the former should not be disclosed. The grounds on which privilege is claimed for the 2 (c) documents are, briefly stated, as follows: (1) that h the commissioners are not entitled to disclose documents and information obtained by them pursuant to the powers conferred on them by s 24 (6) of the 1963 Act, (2) even if the commissioners are entitled to disclose such documents and information it would be contrary to the public interest that they should do so because such material is confidential in character, that it would cause general resentment if it were known that information of this sort obtained by the exercise of compulsory powers was liable to be disclosed to other persons including trade competitors of the informant, i that traders hereafter asked for information of this sort would be tempted to withhold it and that the good relations which usually exist between the commissioners and their officers, on the one hand, and the traders with whom they deal, on the other, would be impaired.

The appellants advanced these claims to privilege by a summons issued on 15th June 1971 which came before Forbes J¹ who rejected both claims. His grounds for rejecting the claim to legal professional privilege were, (a) that in this field salaried legal advisers are not in the same position as solicitors practising on their own account, (b) that litigation cannot be anticipated before a cause of action has arisen and the mere fact that the commissioners thought that it was most unlikely that the appellants would accept their opinion did not mean that they were anticipating litigation within the meaning of the rule, (c) that in any case the information in question was obtained and the documents in question came into being in order to enable the commissioners to fix the wholesale value correctly and that the fact that the information and documents were to be submitted to the legal department to prepare the commissioners' case in the arbitration was so subsidiary a purpose that it could be disregarded. As regards the public interest claim he held that the commissioners had power to disclose the material in question and that the public interest would suffer far more damage by non-disclosure than by disclosure.

The commissioners appealed from the decision of Forbes J¹ to the Court of Appeal², who allowed the appeal. Counsel appear to have failed to make it clear to the court, or at all events to Lord Denning MR, that the claim to legal professional privilege extended to the 2 (c) documents as well as to the 2 (b) documents. Lord Denning MR held (1) that the 2 (b) documents were covered by legal professional privilege: (2) that the 2 (c) documents were not covered by Crown—i.e. 'public interest'—privilege but (3) that there was a general ground of privilege—not peculiar to the Crown—applicable to documents entrusted in confidence by a third party to the person from whom discovery of them is sought. Karminski and Orr LJ³ agreed with the judgment of Lord Denning MR—though the former at any rate appreciated that legal professional privilege was being claimed for the 2 (c) documents as well as for the 2 (b) documents and thought that this claim was justified.

It will be convenient to deal first with the ground on which Lord Denning MR upheld the claim to privilege with regard to the 2 (c) documents—a ground which we were told had not been relied on by the commissioners in argument. It is clear that in general a party cannot object to produce a document not covered by legal professional privilege because the information contained in it was imparted to him in confidence. In *Chantrey Martin & Co v Martin*³ the Court of Appeal approved the statement of the general principle in *Bray on Discovery*⁴ which runs as follows:

'The mere fact that the giving of the discovery will involve a breach of confidence as against some third person or in any way affect or prejudice his interests does not constitute of itself an independent objection to giving the discovery, a disclosure under the compulsion of the court being for this purpose distinguished from voluntary disclosure out of court.'

What Lord Denning MR is saying in the section on his judgment headed 'An alternative ground of privilege' is, I take it, that the general principle is subject to the exception that, as he puts it⁵—

'a party to litigation is not obliged to produce documents, or copies of documents, which do not belong to him, but which have been entrusted to his custody by a third party in confidence.'

Such an exception would be combining, if not confusing, two quite different considerations—the property in the document and the confidential nature of its contents—and I do not believe that it exists. Until the rules of the court were changed in

- a 1964 a party from whom discovery was sought though he had to disclose the existence of documents which were in his custody but which belonged wholly or partly to a third party could not be ordered to produce such documents for inspection. That rule had nothing to do with the confidential nature of the contents of the documents: it applied to all documents whether confidential or not. Further, as Bray¹ points out, it was no protection against an order for inspection of a copy of the document
- b (unless that too belonged to the third party) or against the disclosure of the contents of the document in answer to interrogatories. Even if the rules had remained unaltered I would not have thought that the commissioners could have taken an objection based on property in this case since we were told that the 2 (c) documents are photostats of the originals and presumably they belong to the commissioners; but in any case, as I have said, under the new rules there is no longer a distinction
- c between the obligation to disclose the existence of documents and the obligation to produce them for inspection². If once any objection based on property is out of the way there seems to be no logic in this alleged exception to the general rule. Privilege cannot be claimed for a letter written in the strictest confidence by a third party to the party from whom its discovery is sought: see *Hopkinson v Lord Burghley*³; but such a letter might contain a summary of the contents of some document in the hands of a third party. Why, then, should a different rule apply if the document
- d itself is handed over in confidence?

- The only authority which lends any support to the view that privilege might be claimed on the ground of 'confidence' in the latter case is *Enthoven v Cobb*⁴, which is discussed at length by Bray⁵. There two people—H and C—were suing E on similar causes of action in separate proceedings. C obtained from H a case to and opinion of counsel which H had taken for use in her proceedings on the under-
- e standing—express or implied—that C might take copies and use them for the purpose of his proceedings but not otherwise. Obviously E could not have compelled H to disclose these documents to him in the action H v E but he contended—unsuccessfully—that he could compel their disclosure by C in the action C v E. Parker V-C⁶ based his judgment partly on the ground that legal professional privilege applied
- f as much in C's action as it would have applied in H's action since the documents were procured by C so that he could submit them to his legal advisers and partly on the ground that H had a property interest in the copies as well as the originals. In the Court of Appeal in Chancery⁷, Knight Bruce LJ said that he agreed with the judgment of Parker V-C⁶ but in his own judgment he used language which suggests that he may have thought that even if it was not a case of legal professional privilege and even if H had no property in the documents C could not be ordered to produce
- g them because H had entrusted them to him in confidence. The decision in the case may well have been right on the ground that the documents were the subject of legal professional privilege in C's hands, but if and so far as Knight Bruce LJ based his judgment simply on confidence I agree with Bray that his reasoning was wrong. The language used by Knight Bruce LJ in *Enthoven v Cobb*⁷
- h was relied on by Cairns QC in the passage in his argument in *Reynolds v Godlee*⁸ which is quoted by Lord Denning MR⁹ but it is not, with respect, right to say that Page-Wood V-C accepted the proposition as correct. He referred to it but he did not say that he agreed with it and he decided the case before him on the ground that the documents in question were the subject of legal professional privilege. The other case to which Lord Denning MR refers, *Watson v Cammell Laird & Co (Shipbuilders & Engineers) Ltd*¹, was also a case of legal professional privilege. In my judgment, if the commissioners are to succeed with regard to the 2 (c) documents it must be on the ground either of legal professional privilege or of public interest.

The Court of Appeal² held that Forbes J was wrong in holding that there was any distinction for the purpose of a claim to legal professional privilege between solicitors in private practice and salaried legal advisers and the appellants did not challenge that view in their appeal to this House. They did, however, submit that the commissioners ought not to have 'anticipated litigation' within the meaning of the rules as to legal professional privilege as early as 31st July 1967. There was not, so far as I can see, any need for the appellants to have requested a reference to arbitration at that stage. It may well be that the request was made ex abundanti cautela and that the appellants were hoping that they might obtain a reduction in the tax payable by a process of negotiation. But whatever may have been in their minds it does not lie in their mouth to complain that the commissioners on receipt of the letter formed the view that any value which they fixed would almost certainly be challenged and there was nothing in the subsequent correspondence to cause them to think otherwise. So even if the existence of privilege in respect of the 2 (b) (i) documents depends on the reference to arbitration having been anticipated when they were written (which I doubt) I think that the Court of Appeal² was right in holding that the claim was made out with regard to them as well as with regard to the 2 (a) documents.

The documents in 2 (b) (ii) and (c) appear to fall, in descending order of importance, under three heads: (i) Documents obtained from or containing information obtained from third parties by reason of the existence of the powers given by s 24 (6). (ii) Documents containing observations by members of the staff of the commissioners as to the fixing of the wholesale value made in the light of and often referring to the documents and information obtained from the appellants and from such third parties. (iii) Instructions as to the methods to be employed by the staff in conducting its investigations.

Head (iii) can be left out of account since the appellants made it clear that they had no wish to see any such instructions. The commissioners' case for claiming legal professional privilege with regard to the documents comprised in heads (i) and (ii) may be stated as follows: 'The documents were obtained or came into existence for two purposes—first to assist the valuation department of the commissioners in fixing the wholesale value of the machines and secondly to assist the legal department in upholding that valuation in the arbitration which it was anticipated would be called for. If they had been obtained or had come into being for no purpose other than that of being laid before the legal advisers of the commissioners to help them in presenting the commissioners' case in anticipated litigation they would clearly have been entitled to legal professional privilege and the cases show that the fact that they were obtained or came into existence for another purpose as well even though such other purpose was in fact the primary purpose makes no difference.' This argument was accepted by the Court of Appeal²—though Lord Denning MR thought that legal professional privilege was only being claimed for the 2 (b) (ii) documents. The most important of the many cases on this subject are summarised in the judgment of Havers J in *Seabrook v British Transport Commission*³. In that case—and the facts in several of the other cases were very similar—employees of

- a the defendants in pursuance of routine instructions had made a report to head office of the circumstances of an accident which had occurred on the railway. There were several reasons why such reports were required. One was that the commission was under a statutory duty to report accidents to the Minister of Transport; another was so that the appropriate department might consider whether any disciplinary measures or changes in the methods of work were called for; yet another was that
- b in the event of a claim being made by the party injured the report could be laid before the commission's solicitor for his advice. Havers J pointed out that it was difficult—if not impossible—to reconcile all the cases, that the earlier cases tended on the whole to favour disclosure in such circumstances; but that after the approval of the judgment of Buckley LJ in *Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Co Ltd v London and North Western Railway Co*¹ by Scrutton LJ in *Ogden v London Electric Railway Co*² it must be taken as established that the fact that the purpose of submission to the legal adviser was only one and may be not the most important of several purposes for which the report was prepared did not prevent it from being privileged. The Seabrook case³ was considered a few months later by my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock—then Diplock J—in *Longthorn v British Transport Commission*⁴. There the commission had held an enquiry into the circumstances
- d of the accident before the plaintiff, who was one of their employees and gave evidence at the enquiry, issued his writ. In the action the commission claimed privilege for the report of the enquiry but the judge having looked at it held that it was not privileged because the enquiry was not to any appreciable extent held for the purpose of obtaining for or furnishing to the solicitor evidence or information to help him in defending any proceedings which the plaintiff might bring. In his judgment
- e he said that it was not necessary for him to decide to what extent the purpose of submission to the solicitors must be the main or substantial purpose of the coming into being of the document in question since he was satisfied that the mere fact that it was a purpose however insubstantial could not found a claim for privilege; but reading the judgment as a whole it is, I think, fair to conclude that my noble and learned friend viewed the trend of the decisions since 1913 with some distaste and that he inclined to prefer the judgment of Hamilton LJ in the Birmingham case¹
- f to that of Buckley LJ.

- One day it may be necessary for this House to consider the point but in my judgment it does not arise for decision in this case. In the *Ogden*² and *Seabrook*³ type of case the reports in question are obtained for two or more quite separate purposes. Here the two purposes for which the documents in question were obtained or came into existence were parts of a single wider purpose—namely, the ascertainment of the wholesale value in the manner prescribed by the Act. The first, and the sole immediate, purpose was to help the commissioners to fix what in their opinion was the true value; the second purpose was to help the solicitor, if the commissioners' opinion was challenged, to prepare their case for the arbitration. It was not—and hardly could have been—suggested that the mere fact that the commissioners would
- g know in every case that their opinion might be challenged would itself enable them to claim that such documents as are in question here would be the subject of legal professional privilege whenever in fact their opinion was challenged. What is said to make them privileged in this case is the fact that the commissioners happened to expect that there would be an arbitration and called in the solicitor to 'hold their hands' in the early stages. But, even so, in this case just as much as in cases in which
- h no arbitration was in fact anticipated the commissioners had to form their own opinion as to value on the evidence available to them, including these documents, before any arbitration could take place. This feature of the case appears to me to distinguish it from the *Ogden*¹ or *Seabrook*² type of case and to make it analogous to *Jones v Great Central Railway Co*³. There a member of a trade union who thought that he had been unjustly dismissed by his employers furnished the union authorities (as required by the rules) with information in writing as to the facts of the case as he saw them in order to satisfy them that it was proper for them to sanction the employment of a solicitor to conduct the case and also for use by the solicitor in the conduct of the action if the employment of a solicitor was sanctioned. This House held that the letters in question were not the subject of legal professional privilege because the union authorities had themselves to consider them and act on them before the solicitor was employed to conduct the case. So here the commissioners had to form their own opinion as to value before the solicitor would use the documents for the purpose of defending their opinion in the anticipated arbitration.
- j

I turn now to the question of 'Crown privilege' or rather privilege on the ground of 'public interest'. Sir Louis Petch first submits that the commissioners have no power to disclose documents obtained from or containing information obtained from third parties in pursuance of the powers conferred by s 24 (6) of the Act unless they have express statutory authority for so doing. Lord Denning MR⁴ rightly rejected this contention which your Lordships have held to be ill-founded in *Norwich Pharmacal Co v Comrs of Customs and Excise*⁵. But then Sir Louis says that even if they have power to do so the commissioners think that it is contrary to the public interest for them to disclose such documents or any other documents which contain references to the contents of documents obtained under s 24 (6) because such documents were obtained in confidence from the third parties concerned on the understanding that the commissioners would not disclose them to anyone else. Such disclosure, it is said, would be unfair to the third parties and would be harmful to the proper working of the department. So far as I can see the Court of Appeal⁶ did not deal with this argument at all. It is true that Lord Denning MR points out that the 2 (c) documents are documents of an ordinary character—invoices and so on—such as are normally disclosed by parties to litigation: but Sir Louis's objection to their disclosure is not based on their character but on the manner in which they were obtained. 'Confidentiality' is not a separate head of privilege, but it may be a very material consideration to bear in mind when privilege is claimed on the ground of public interest. What the court has to do is to weigh on the one hand the considerations which suggest that it is in the public interest that the documents in question should be disclosed and on the other hand those which suggest that it is in the public interest that they should not be disclosed and to balance one against the other. Plainly there is much to be said in favour of disclosure. The documents in question constitute an important part of the material on which the commissioners based their conclusion that the appellants sell to retailers. That is shown by the reply which the commissioners made to the request for particulars under para 5 (h) of the defence. Yet if the claim to privilege made by the commissioners is upheld this information will be withheld from the arbitrator. No doubt it will form part of the brief delivered to counsel for the commissioners and may help him to probe the appellants' evidence in cross-examination; but counsel will not be able to use it as evidence to controvert anything which the appellants' witnesses may say. It is said, of course, that the appellants cannot reasonably complain if the commissioners think it right to tie their own hands in this way. But if the arbitrator should decide against them the appellants may feel—however wrongly—

a that the arbitrator was unconsciously influenced by the fact that the commissioners stated in their pleadings that they had this further evidence in support of their view which they did not disclose and which the appellants had no opportunity to controvert. Moreover, whoever wins it is desirable that the arbitrator should have all the relevant material before him. On the other hand, there is much to be said against disclosure. The case is not, indeed, as strong as the case against disclosing the name of an informer—for the result of doing that would be that the source of information b would dry up whereas here the commissioners will continue to have their powers under s 24 (6). Nevertheless, the case against disclosure is, to my mind, far stronger than it was in the Norwich Pharmacal case¹. There it was probable that all the importers whose names were disclosed were wrongdoers and the disclosure of the names of any, if there were any, who were innocent would not be likely to do them any harm at all. Here, on the other hand, one can well see that the third parties who c have supplied this information to the commissioners because of the existence of their statutory powers would very much resent its disclosure by the commissioners to the appellants and that it is not at all fanciful for Sir Louis to say that the knowledge that the commissioners cannot keep such information secret may be harmful to the efficient working of the Act. In a case where the considerations for and against d disclosure appear to be fairly evenly balanced the courts should I think uphold a claim to privilege on the ground of public interest and trust to the head of the department concerned to do whatever he can to mitigate the ill-effects of non-disclosure. Forbes J² was so impressed by those possible ill-effects, that he failed to appreciate how reasonable Sir Louis's objections to disclosure were and dismissed them with the remark³ 'We are not living in the early days of the Tudor administration.' I do not regard Sir Louis as a modern Cardinal Morton. His objections to e disclosure were taken in the interests of the third parties concerned as much as in the interests of the commissioners and if any of them is in fact willing to give evidence, privilege in respect of any documents or information obtained from him will be waived. In the result therefore I would dismiss the appeal—though not for the reasons given by the Court of Appeal⁴.

f LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Cross of Chelsea. I agree with it and have therefore not prepared one of my own.

I would like, however, to add a word or two about the somewhat diverging trends of authority, on the question of discovery of documents said to have been prepared g for the purposes of litigation, which may be typified by the judgments of Buckley LJ in *Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Co Ltd v London and North Western Railway Co*⁵ and of Havers J in *Seabrook v British Transport Commission*⁶, on the one hand, and those of Hamilton LJ in the Birmingham case⁵ and of Diplock J in *Longthorn v British Transport Commission*⁷ on the other. Like my noble and learned h friend, I prefer the approach of the latter to that of the former. In my opinion, any practice of 'blanket' classifying of documents, especially when they concern, as they normally do, claims arising out of accidents, is to be discouraged. In *Ogden v London Electric Railway Co*⁸ Scrutton LJ said this of the documents there in question:

'Counsel for the respondent, as I understand, argues that they are not [that is to say, not prepared for solicitors] because they are reports made to a company to enable it to conduct its own business, namely, to carry on its business without accidents, without any regard to litigation. That may be so. It may be that that is part of the purpose of making the reports, but there is also the substantial purpose that if a writ is issued these are the materials that will be wanted by the solicitor conducting the litigation, and they are obtained for that purpose, among others, and as appears from the form at which we look—because the judge below has looked at these documents—the reports are made on a form headed: "For the information of the company's solicitors only". That is a most important heading, because if a man knows that he is making a confidential report to the solicitor he is much more likely to state accurately what has happened than if he is afraid that somebody presently seeing that report may take proceedings against him in respect of the statements that he has made, which may be defamatory.'

My Lords, I find this hard to accept. When one recollects the circumstances in which such reports are made, and the grade of employee who is commonly required to make them, it seems to me to be unreal to suggest that he will adjust the form and content or vary the candour of the report he is required to make according as the report on its face bears or does not bear that it will at an early stage, or at any stage, be submitted to his employer's solicitor. The point was raised in very similar circumstances before the Court of Session, where the practice in these matters is rather different, in *Whitehill v Glasgow Corpn*¹. The report in that case was made on a form which had as a printed heading: 'For the use of the Corporation solicitors to enable them to defend should litigation ensue.' In holding that the defenders were bound to produce the report, the Lord President observed²:

'These words cannot alter the character of the report which is made by the employee for the purpose of informing his employers of the accident, and made at the time.'

Such reports would be produced on the authority of *Admiralty Comrs v Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co Ltd*³ per Lord Dunedin.

I agree with the order proposed.

a G v G (practice: transfer of applications)

DUNN J

30th MARCH, 3rd APRIL 1973

b Husband and wife – Property – Practice – Related applications – Desirability of applications being heard together – Married Women's Property Act 1882, s 17 – Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, ss 2, 4.

c The husband and wife were married in 1969 and the matrimonial home was bought in their joint names. In 1972 the wife was granted a decree of divorce under s 2 (1) (a) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969. She applied (1) for a declaration under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 that the matrimonial home was owned by her absolutely by reason of her contribution to the purchase price, (2) alternatively for an order under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 that the property be transferred to her, and (3) for an order under s 2 of the 1970 Act for a lump sum payment and for periodical payments for herself and the child of the family. In the s 17 proceedings the husband sought a declaration that the matrimonial home was their joint property, and an order for the sale of the property and the equal division of the proceeds of sale between the parties; in the s 4 proceedings he raised an issue of the wife's conduct, which he alleged drove him to commit adultery. The wife applied to the registrar to have the applications transferred to a judge. He refused and she appealed.

e Held – The appeal would be allowed; the s 17 application was not merely academic for under s 4 of the 1970 Act the court had neither the power to declare the legal or equitable interests of the spouses nor the power to order a sale of a property and, since the evidence in relation to a s 17 application might well be relevant to, and affect the outcome of, an application under the 1970 Act, it was convenient, and also desirable where an issue arose in the s 17 proceedings, for the two related applications to be heard by a judge at first instance so that there might be a single channel of appeal, i.e. to the Court of Appeal; accordingly an order would be made transferring the wife's application to a judge of the Family Division (see p 1189 e and h to p 1190 c, post).

g Per Dunn J. Registrars should be slow to refuse to transfer applications for ancillary relief to a judge where an issue of conduct is raised unless the parties have agreed that conduct is irrelevant to any order likely to be made under the 1970 Act or it is plain to the registrar that it will not materially affect such an order (see p 1189 c, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the wife from the order of Mr Registrar Holloway on 22nd February 1973 dismissing her application to have transferred to a judge her applications (i) under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 for a declaration that the former matrimonial home was owned by her absolutely and (ii) under ss 2 and 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 for the transfer of the former matrimonial home to her, for a lump sum payment and for periodical payments for herself and the child of the family. The appeal was heard in chambers but judgment was given in open court. The facts are set out in the judgment. b

3rd April. DUNN J read the following judgment. This case which was in chambers raised a point of practice of general importance, especially in divorce registries, and I therefore adjourned the case to open court for judgment. d

The point arises in this way. The former wife, whom I shall call 'the wife' has applied under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 for a declaration that the former matrimonial home, a freehold property, is owned by her absolutely. She has also applied under ss 2 and 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 for orders that that property be transferred to her and for a lump sum payment, and also for periodical payments to herself and the child. She applied to the registrar for directions including a direction that both her applications be transferred to a judge. The registrar gave directions but refused to transfer the application to a judge on the ground that there was not likely to be any issue in the s 17 proceedings, and that the only issues likely to arise were those in the applications under ss 2 and 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act. Against that refusal the wife now appeals. e

The material facts are short and may be shortly stated. In May 1967 the house was bought in the joint names of the husband and wife, who were then living together unmarried. A child had been born to them on 21st March 1967. On 31st May 1969 they married. On 31st August 1970 the husband left the wife, and she and the child are still living in the former matrimonial home together with her son by a former marriage. On 4th July 1972 the wife was granted a decree nisi under s 2 (1) (a) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, adultery having been proved between the husband and the second respondent. The decree was made absolute and the husband has now married the second respondent. They are living together at a house in Portsmouth. That house is in their joint names and they are buying it on mortgage. In her affidavit in the s 17 proceedings the wife says that the former matrimonial home is wholly owned by her by reason of her contribution towards the purchase price. Alternatively she asks under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 for a transfer of the husband's share to her. The husband asks in the s 17 proceedings for a declaration that the former matrimonial home is the joint property of husband and wife, and he asks for an order for the sale of that property and that the proceeds of sale be divided equally between them. In the s 4 proceedings the husband raises an issue of the wife's conduct which he alleges drove him to commit adultery. The wife denies that her conduct contributed to the breakdown of the marriage, and alleges that it was caused wholly by reason of the husband's adultery and desertion. f a 1971¹ provides that where an application for ancillary relief giving rise to a contested issue of conduct is transferred from a divorce county court to the High Court the application shall be heard by a judge of the High Court. There is no similar provision in the rules relating to applications for ancillary relief commenced in the High Court which give rise to a contested issue of conduct, and registrars have a discretion under r 78 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules to refer any such application to a judge for his decision. This rule should however be read in the context of r 80 (1).

b Since the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Wachtel v Wachtel*² there will be many cases, perhaps the majority of cases, in which the conduct of either party will not materially affect the order which the court will make under s 4 or indeed under s 2 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. Nonetheless registrars should be slow to refuse to transfer applications for ancillary relief to a judge where an issue of conduct is raised, unless the parties agree that conduct is irrelevant to any order likely to be made under the Act, or unless it is quite plain to the registrar that conduct will not materially affect such an order. But this appeal does not rest primarily on that ground. Counsel for the wife drew my attention to the different channels of appeal from orders made by registrars under the Married Women's Property Act 1882 on the one hand and under the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 on the other. She referred me to the Practice Direction³ made on 29th January 1971. So far as is material that direction is in these terms:

c 'It sometimes happens that applications under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 and applications of ancillary relief in matrimonial causes ... are heard about the same time. The evidence on one application is often relevant to the other application or applications, and the outcome of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 application usually affects the other application or applications. It would be convenient for all the applications to be heard by the same tribunal and, in the event of appeals, for the appeals to be heard by the same tribunal. This would happen if the related applications were heard by a judge at first instance with appeal to the Court of Appeal. Where all applications are in the High Court, the applications are normally heard at present by a registrar at first instance, with appeal to a judge in an application for ancillary relief ... and to the Court of Appeal in an application under the Married Women's Property Act 1882. But it is open to the registrar to refer all such applications to a judge for hearing at first instance; an ancillary relief application can be referred under Matrimonial Causes Rules 1968⁴, r 78 (2) as amended by the Matrimonial Causes (Amendment No 3) Rules 1970⁵ and a Married Women's Property Act application ... can be referred under RSC Ord 32, r 12 It is suggested that judges and registrars dealing with related applications under the Married Women's Property Act 1882 ... and for ancillary relief which arise at the same time should give consideration to the desirability of providing for hearing by the same tribunal by reference, retention or transfer as may be convenient in particular cases.'

d Despite the wide powers over matrimonial property which are now vested in the court by s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, s 17 proceedings are by no means academic. Section 4 gives the court no power to declare the existing legal and equitable interests of the spouses in property, the ascertainment of which may well be necessary before any order varying those interests can properly be made. And s 4 gives the court no power to order the sale of a property, although a similar result may indirectly be obtained in many cases by ordering a lump sum payment under s 2. But in the majority of cases in order that the court may make full use of the powers vested in it so as to do justice between the parties in property and financial matters, it will be desirable for there to be applications under s 17 as well as under ss 2 and 4. Where this is done, as in this case, it will generally be desirable regardless of whether or not an issue of conduct is raised, for both applications to be transferred to a judge for the reasons given in the practice direction to which I have just referred.

In many cases the parties may agree that there is no issue in the s 17 proceedings. In that event an order can be made by consent in those proceedings and the registrar can deal with the s 4 application with an appeal to the judge. But if, as here, an issue arises in the s 17 proceedings, either as to the interests of the respective parties in the property or as to whether or not the property should be sold, then the registrar should normally transfer both applications to a judge so that there is a single channel of appeal. In this case there are issues both as to the interests of the parties in the matrimonial home and whether it should be sold. In those circumstances this appeal will be allowed and there will be an order that both applications should be transferred to a judge in the Family Division.

LORD DENNING MR, BUCKLEY AND STEPHENSON LJJ

3rd, 4th, 13th APRIL 1973

Race relations – Discrimination – Unlawful discrimination – Discrimination against person seeking to obtain or use goods, facilities or services – Discrimination on ground of colour – Discrimination against one person on ground of another person’s colour – Foster parents – Local authority fostering children with foster parents in exercise of statutory duty – Foster parents refusing to accept coloured children – Whether children or local authority ‘seeking to obtain’ facilities provided by foster parents – Whether refusal to accept coloured children discrimination against local authority ‘on ground of colour’ – Race Relations Act 1968, ss 1 (1), 2 (1).

Race relations – Incitement – Incitement to unlawful discrimination – Incitement not limited to advice, encouragement or persuasion – Incitement including threats and bringing of pressure – Pressure brought on foster parents of children in local authority care to accept white children only – Race Relations Act 1968, s 12.

Mr and Mrs W were registered with certain local authorities as suitable foster parents. Children were placed by the authorities with Mr and Mrs W in the exercise of the

- a* authorities' statutory duty to put out children in their care to foster parents or otherwise provide for their welfare. Mr and Mrs W undertook to care for and bring up the children as they would a child of their own; the children fostered with them lived with them as members of their family, being provided with a nursery, toys and a garden. Mr and Mrs W took only four or five children at a time into their home or, in an emergency, up to seven. The children stayed a short time only, usually for two or three weeks. Mr and Mrs W were only paid their expenses and did not make a profit out of fostering. They could refuse to take a child but so long as they had room they had in fact never done so. In particular they never refused a child on the ground of colour; 60 per cent of the children fostered with them were coloured children. In 1970 Mr and Mrs W moved to another house where they hoped to extend their fostering work. During August 1971 an organisation called the 'National Front', acting through its branch and area organisers, the defendants, brought pressure on Mr and Mrs W to foster white children only. They sent a circular to local residents which referred to the enlargement of Mr and Mrs W's house as a foster home 'for largely non-British children' and accused them of making 'malicious and disgraceful attacks' on their neighbours. They wrote to Mr W urging him to tell the authorities that he would accept only white children. They endeavoured to whip up the neighbours' resentment and opposition, and to intimidate Mr and Mrs W by organising a public meeting at which the first defendant read extracts from the circular and the second defendant made a speech attacking Mr and Mrs W. The Race Relations Board brought proceedings in the county court against the defendants alleging that the acts done by them in August 1971 were in breach of s 12^a of the Race Relations Act 1968, being deliberate incitement of Mr and Mrs W to act unlawfully under s 2^b of the Act by refusing to provide fostering facilities on the ground of colour; the board sought a declaration that the defendants' acts were unlawful under ss 2 and 12, and an injunction restraining them from deliberately inducing or inciting any other person to do an act which was unlawful under the 1968 Act. The county court judge dismissed the board's claim on the ground that although there was incitement within s 12 in respect of the circular, there was no incitement of Mr and Mrs W to unlawful discrimination under s 2 because Mr and Mrs W were not concerned with the provision of facilities or services to a section of the public within s 2 (1). The board appealed. At the date of the hearing of the appeal the acts done by the defendants in August 1971 had not been repeated and they had since ceased to be members of the National Front.

- g* Held – (i) Mr and Mrs W were concerned with 'the provision to . . . a section of the public . . . of facilities' within s 2 (1) of the 1968 Act. They provided 'facilities' in that they provided the children with accommodation, entertainment, recreation and the other things which the children needed for their welfare (see p 1195 h and j, p 1197 f and p 1198 g, post). Furthermore those facilities were provided by Mr and Mrs W to a 'section of the public' since they were provided, as part of a statutory scheme, to all the children who happened to be in the care of the local authorities; it was immaterial that only a few of the children would be able to avail themselves of the facilities; the whole group of potential foster children was the relevant 'section of the public' for the purposes of s 2 (1). Alternatively the facilities were provided to the local authorities who (per Buckley LJ, Lord Denning MR and Stephenson LJ dubitante) themselves constituted a 'section of the public' (see p 1196 d and e, p 1197 f and p 1198 j to p 1199 c, post).

- j* (ii) If they had insisted on fostering white children only Mr and Mrs W would have been discriminating against persons 'seeking to obtain or use' the facilities provided by them within s 2 (1) of the 1968 Act. The coloured children in need of fostering were persons seeking to obtain or use the facilities in that the local authorities, acting

b Section 2, so far as material, is set out at p 1195 a and b, post in the place of their parents, were seeking to obtain the facilities on the children's behalf. Alternatively, if the local authorities were the persons 'seeking to obtain' the facilities Mr and Mrs W would have been discriminating against them 'on the ground of colour', within s 1 (1)^c of the 1968 Act; s 2 (1) applied to discrimination against a body corporate such as a local authority and the definition of discrimination in s 1 (1) was wide enough to cover the case where A discriminated against B on the ground of C's colour (see p 1196 f to j, p 1197 f and p 1199 e to h, post).

(iii) Accordingly it would have been unlawful discrimination under ss 1 and 2 of the 1968 Act for Mr and Mrs W to have stipulated with the local authorities that they would foster white children only (see p 1197 c f and j to p 1198 a, post).

(iv) The defendants had 'incited' Mr and Mrs W, within s 12 of the 1968 Act, to discriminate unlawfully. The word 'incite' in s 12 was not limited to advice, encouragement or persuasion of another to do an act but included threatening or bringing pressure to bear on a person. Accordingly the defendants, by bringing pressure to bear on Mr and Mrs W to take white children only, had 'incited' them to do so within the meaning of s 12. It followed that, since it would have been unlawful discrimination under the Act for Mr and Mrs W to take white children only, it was, by virtue of s 12, unlawful for the defendants to incite them to do so. The appeal would therefore be allowed and a declaration granted that the defendants' acts in August 1971 were unlawful by virtue of ss 2 and 12 of the 1968 Act; an injunction against the defendants would, however, be refused as there had been no repetition of the acts for 20 months (see p 1194 j and p 1197 d f g and j to p 1198 a, post).

Re A B (an infant) [1954] 2 All ER 287 and Charter v Race Relations Board [1973] 1 All ER 512 applied.

Per Lord Denning MR. I would not, as at present advised, consider children fostered by private arrangement or children adopted under the Adoption Acts as 'a section of the public'. They are the subject of personal selection or approval like the members of a social club. That element is so important that they cannot be regarded as 'a section of the public' (see p 1197 a and b, post).

Appeal

At all material times Mr and Mrs Watson fostered children at their home at 61 Oakroyd Avenue, Potters Bar, Hertfordshire, for Barnet Borough Council, Haringey Borough Council and Hertfordshire County Council. The plaintiffs, the Race Relations Board, brought proceedings in the county court against the defendants, Peter W Applin and Kenneth Taylor, claiming a declaration that the acts referred to in para 4 of the particulars of claim were unlawful by virtue of ss 2 and 12 of the Race

^c Section 1 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 1196 h, post

- a* Relations Act 1968, and an injunction restraining the defendants, their servants or agents from deliberately inducing or inciting any other person to do an act which was unlawful by virtue of any provision in Part I of the 1968 Act. Paragraph 4 of the particulars of claim alleged that during August 1971 the defendants repeatedly acted in breach of s 12 of the 1968 Act by deliberately inducing and/or inciting Mr and Mrs Watson to act unlawfully, contrary to s 2 of the 1968 Act, by refusing or deliberately omitting, on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins, to provide the facilities and services of child fostering at their home to persons seeking to obtain or use those facilities or services. The particulars of inducement or incitement given in para 4 were, as to the first defendant, Mr Applin, that he, his servants or agents published and distributed to the residents of Oakroyd Avenue a circular dated 5th August 1971, signed by him as branch organiser of the South Hertfordshire branch of the National Front organisation, deliberately inducing or inciting Mr and Mrs Watson to act unlawfully as aforesaid; that he, his servants or agents organised and advertised a public meeting, held on 26th August 1971 at Oakmere House, High Street, Potters Bar, with the purpose of deliberately inducing or inciting Mr and Mrs Watson to act unlawfully as aforesaid; that he, his servants or agents on or about 25th August 1971 published and distributed to the residents of Oakroyd Avenue an undated open letter, signed by him, so as deliberately to induce or incite Mr and Mrs Watson to act unlawfully as aforesaid. The particulars given in para 4 as to the second defendant, Mr Taylor, were that he wrote and sent two letters, dated 9th and 16th August 1971, deliberately inducing or inciting Mr and Mrs Watson to act as aforesaid; he participated in organising and advertising the meeting of 26th August and at that meeting made a speech deliberately inducing or inciting Mr and Mrs Watson to act as aforesaid. The trial judge, his Honour Judge Ruttle, in a reserved judgment given on 25th July 1972, gave judgment for the defendants holding that there was incitement within the meaning of s 12 of the 1968 Act in respect of the circular dated 5th August but not in respect of the meeting of 26th August; but that the incitement proved against the defendants was not incitement of Mr and Mrs Watson to do an unlawful act since Mr and Mrs Watson were not concerned with the provision of facilities or services to a section of the public within s 2 of the Act. The plaintiff board appealed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

J P Comyn QC and M J Beloff for the plaintiff board.

John Vinelott QC and Mark Potter for the first defendant, Mr Applin.

The second defendant, Mr Taylor, appeared in person.

- g* 13th April. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR. Mr and Mrs Watson have for 23 years fostered children in need of a temporary home. They do it from sincere and unselfish motives. They see it as a practical expression of their Christian faith. Normally they take four or five children at a time, but it may rise to seven on occasion. The children only stay for two or three weeks. Quite a number of the children are coloured. Just over half, about 60 per cent.

- h* In January 1970 Mr and Mrs Watson moved to 61 Oakroyd Avenue, Potters Bar in Hertfordshire. There they hoped to extend their good work. At first some of the neighbours objected. They said that the house was under covenant to be used for residential purposes only. But those objections were overcome. Soon afterwards, however, objections were made on another score. An organisation calling itself the 'National Front' complained that most of the children fostered by Mr and Mrs Watson were coloured children. The National Front acted through its branch organiser, Mr Applin, and its area organiser, Mr Taylor. These two gentlemen brought pressure on Mr and Mrs Watson to get them to take white children only. These were some of the things they did.

On 5th August 1971 Mr Applin sent a circular to the residents of Oakroyd Avenue. It referred to 'the enlargement of premises in Oakroyd Avenue for use as a foster home for largely non-British children'. It accused Mr and Mrs Watson of making 'malicious and disgraceful attacks' on their neighbours. It stated as a fact 'that immigrant parents because of their different standards and attitudes are quite prepared to let others take responsibility for their excess offspring'. In a letter to Mr Watson of 16th August 1971, Mr Taylor said:

'In answer to your question asking me if I am urging you to tell the local authorities that you will only except [sic] white children. YES I am, as I stated in my letter: "Charity Should Begin At Home." The number of immigrant parents who are only too ready to dump their unwanted offsprings onto the local ratepayers is a national scandal. Every week one sees advertisements in local papers and in shop windows concerning Immigrants who wish to Foster out their children. In my opinion, if we the indigenous population did likewise, there would be hell to play.'

On 26th August 1971 the National Front organised a public meeting at Potters Bar. Mr Applin read extracts from the circular. Mr Taylor said:

'While you have people such as Mr. Watson who delight in putting immigrants' welfare before their own people's, this process of turning more and more of British town and cities into coloured ghettos will continue.'

On 9th February 1972 the Race Relations Board issued proceedings in the county court claiming that the acts done by Mr Applin and Mr Taylor were unlawful and seeking an injunction.

It is not easy to apply the Race Relations Act 1968 to the situation before us, but I will try and explain it. It is quite clear that Mr and Mrs Watson were acting perfectly lawfully. They were fostering children without making any difference between them on the ground of colour. Mr Applin and Mr Taylor were bringing pressure to bear on Mr and Mrs Watson to get them to take white children only, and not coloured ones. That pressure did not succeed. Mr and Mrs Watson have resisted it. They have continued to take white and coloured children without making any difference. They continue so to take them. But, the point is this. Suppose the pressure had succeeded. Suppose that Mr and Mrs Watson had stipulated 'We will only take white children'. Would that conduct of Mr and Mrs Watson have been unlawful? If it would have been unlawful, then it was unlawful of Mr Applin and Mr Taylor to bring pressure to bear on Mr and Mrs Watson to do an unlawful act. This follows from s 12 of the 1968 Act, which says:

'Any person who deliberately aids, induces or incites another person to do an act which is unlawful by virtue of any provision of this Part of this Act shall be treated for the purposes of this Act as doing that act.'

If, therefore, Mr Applin and Mr Taylor 'incited' Mr and Mrs Watson to do an unlawful act, i.e. to take white children only, they are to be treated as themselves doing that act, even though the incitement did not succeed. Here I may mention a small point. Counsel for Mr Applin suggested that to 'incite' means to urge or spur on by advice, encouragement, and persuasion, and not otherwise. I do not think the word is so limited, at any rate in this context. A person may 'incite' another to do an act by threatening or by pressure, as well as persuasion. Mr Applin and Mr Taylor undoubtedly brought pressure to bear on Mr and Mrs Watson to take white children only, and thus 'incited' them to do so.

So the question is this: if Mr and Mrs Watson had stipulated: 'We will take white children only', and acted accordingly, would their conduct have been unlawful? This depends on s 2 (1) of the 1968 Act, which says:

a 'It shall be unlawful for any person concerned with the provision to the public or a section of the public (whether on payment or otherwise) of any goods, facilities or services to discriminate against any person seeking to obtain or use those goods, facilities or services by refusing or deliberately omitting to provide him with any of them or to provide him with goods, services or facilities of the like quality, in the like manner and on the like terms in and on which the former normally makes them available to other members of the public.'

b In order to see whether it would be unlawful for Mr and Mrs Watson to stipulate for white children only, I must state the nature of their fostering.

1. The children

c The children are allocated to Mr and Mrs Watson by three local authorities, the boroughs of Haringey and Barnet and Hertfordshire County Council. These local authorities are under a statutory duty to receive into their care any child who is lost, or whose parents have died, or are incapable of looking after the child, or who have abandoned him: see s 1 of the Children Act 1948. Having received such a child into their care, the local authority are under a statutory duty to put him out with foster parents or otherwise provide for his welfare: see s 13 of the 1948 Act. When they put him out to foster parents, they must satisfy the Boarding-out of Children Regulations 1955¹. Under those regulations the local authorities must keep a register of the foster parents and of the children. They must make proper arrangements for the child to live in the dwelling of the foster parents as a member of the family. The foster parents have to give an undertaking that they will care for the child and bring him up as they would a child of their own.

e 2. The foster parents

f Mr and Mrs Watson are registered with all three local authorities as suitable foster parents. They can only take into their home four or five children at a time, though they have been known to go up to seven, if there is urgent need. In any particular case the welfare officer telephones and asks if they have room. It is often at night. Mr and Mrs Watson always accept if they can manage it. Then the welfare officer or a policewoman brings the child along. The children are only with them for a short time, usually two or three weeks. Mr and Mrs Watson make them at home in every way, with toys and playtime in the nursery and the garden. They make no profit out of it. They only get paid their expenses. They have the right to refuse a child if they think he would not fit in, or was otherwise unsuitable. But, in point of fact, they never refuse any child so long as they have room. In particular, they never refuse any child on the ground of his or her colour. It so happens that just over half are coloured, about 60 per cent.

'Facilities'

h The first question under s 2 is whether Mr and Mrs Watson are 'concerned with the provision to the public or a section of the public . . . of any goods, facilities or services'. It is plain that Mr and Mrs Watson are concerned with the provision of facilities for the welfare of the children. They provide them with everything the children need. But, counsel for Mr Applin suggests that that is not enough. Those facilities, he says, are provided for the children after they are already in the house; and that is not sufficient to satisfy the section any more than the facilities provided for the members of a club. I cannot accept this suggestion. Mr and Mrs Watson clearly provide facilities.

'A section of the public'

j The judge held that the facilities were not provided to a section of the public. He applied a test which I proposed in this court in *Race Relations Board v Charter*². But

I was wrong. The House of Lords¹ have said so. So, the judge is to be excused, although I am not. a

There are two sets of persons to be considered here: (i) the children; (ii) the local authorities. So far as the children are concerned, the facilities are clearly provided to them. They are provided to the children in the same way as facilities are provided to the residents in a hotel or to the lodgers in a boarding house.

So far as the local authorities are concerned, the facilities are also provided to them. The local authorities have the children in their care and stand in loco parentis to them: see *Re A B (an infant)*². They stand in a similar position to parents who send children to a school. The facilities for education are provided, not only to or for the school children themselves, but also to or for the parents who want their children to be educated. So here the facilities are provided to the local authorities. b

Considering first the children, do they constitute a 'section of the public'? The House of Lords have held that these are words of limitation and that 'public' is used in contrast to 'private': see *Charter v Race Relations Board*³. Counsel for Mr Applin suggests that the children when inside the house are members of a family, and that the provision of facilities to them is as much private as the provision of facilities to the members of a social club. He instanced also fostering by private arrangement, or adoption, which are clearly private. I cannot accept this suggestion. The large quota of children who are in the care of the local authorities are clearly a 'section of the public', coming as they do haphazard from the public at large. The provision of facilities is a provision to that section of the public, even though only a few can avail themselves of the facilities. It is like a boarding-housekeeper who takes in lodgers. The group of potential lodgers is a 'section of the public' even though only a few can avail themselves of the facilities. c

Considering next the local authorities, I have some doubt whether they can properly be regarded as a 'section of the public'. They are bodies corporate who are the guardians of the public interest, but they are hardly themselves 'a section of the public'. d

'Discrimination'

The next question is whether Mr and Mrs Watson, if they insisted that they would only take white children, would by so doing 'discriminate against any person seeking to obtain or use' those facilities. I think they would discriminate against the coloured children. Those children may be so young as to be unable themselves to '[seek] to obtain or use [the] facilities'. But the local authorities stand in loco parentis to them and can seek on their behalf. e

Alternatively, I think that, by insisting on white children, Mr and Mrs Watson would be discriminating against the local authorities themselves. Counsel for the plaintiff board put this test. Suppose two white women frequently bring coloured men into a public house. The innkeeper says to them: 'You cannot come in here again if you come with coloured men.' Counsel for the plaintiffs suggests that the innkeeper would be discriminating against the two women. I agree. Section 1 (1) of the Act says: f

'. . . a person discriminates against another if on the ground of colour . . . he treats that other . . . less favourably than he treats . . . other persons . . .'

That definition of discrimination is wide enough to cover the case of the two women. They are treated less favourably than other women on the ground of colour. Similarly in this case, Mr and Mrs Watson would discriminate against the local authorities on the ground of colour if they said: 'We will take white children only.' g a We were referred to many of the other sections of the 1968 Act, but these did not seem to me to help much. We were also invited to consider the fostering of children by private arrangement. There are statutory provisions governing it. They are set out in the Children Act 1958. At the other end of the scale, we were invited to consider the adoption of children under the Adoption Acts. I would not, as at present advised, consider the children in these categories as a 'section of the public'. They are the subject of personal selection or approval like the members of a social club.

b This element is so important that they cannot be regarded as a 'section of the public'. It seems to me that the foster parents, fostering privately, or the adopting parents, as the case might be, could lawfully say: 'We will only have a white child.' But this case is different. In those cases the facilities are provided to the individual children as and when they become members of the family. In this case the facilities are provided to the large group of 'children in care' of the local authority. That group is a 'section of the public', even though only a few can avail themselves of it.

c In my opinion, therefore, it would be unlawful for Mr and Mrs Watson to stipulate with the local authority that they would take white children only. It would be unlawful discrimination on the ground of colour contrary to ss 1 and 2 of the 1968 Act. It was, therefore, unlawful for Mr Applin and Mr Taylor to incite Mr and Mrs Watson to take white children only by bringing pressure on them to do so.

d I would grant a declaration to this effect, but I would not grant an injunction. There has been no repetition for 20 months of the matters complained of. Mr Applin and Mr Taylor have both, we were told, ceased to be members of the National Front.

e I would pay tribute to the careful judgment of the judge, which has been most helpful. I would allow the appeal.

f BUCKLEY LJ. Having had an opportunity to read the judgment which has just been delivered by Lord Denning MR and that which Stephenson LJ is about to deliver, with both of which I agree, I do not feel it necessary to add anything except to say that, in my judgment, corporate bodies are as capable of constituting a class of members of the public as human beings are, and that in the present case Mr and Mrs Watson provide facilities and services to two sections of the public consisting of (1) children in the care of the three local authorities, and (2) the three local authorities, both of which consist of persons or bodies seeking to obtain or use those facilities and services.

g I would allow the appeal and make the declaration suggested by Lord Denning MR. I would not grant an injunction.

h STEPHENSON LJ. I agree that this appeal should be allowed. If the Watsons had yielded to the efforts of Mr Applin and Mr Taylor and had refused to foster coloured children, would they have been guilty of unlawful discrimination, contrary to s 2 (1) of the Race Relations Act 1968, as that subsection has been interpreted by the House of Lords in *Charter v Race Relations Board*¹? This seems to me to be the first question raised by this appeal. If the answer is Yes, the second is: did those efforts constitute incitement contrary to s 12 of the Act? If the answer again is Yes, the third is: can and ought the court to permit an injunction, and in what terms, j in addition to the declaration prayed?

I have no doubt about any question but the first. On the second and third questions I have nothing to add to what Lord Denning MR has said. The defendants plainly incited Mr Watson to discriminate more than once, but equally plainly they have not shown any intention to incite for 20 months, and I agree that no injunction should be granted. a

I also agree that the discrimination to which they incited the Watsons would have been unlawful and the plaintiff board is therefore entitled to the declaration which the judge refused to grant. As we are differing from him and the question is important and not, in my opinion, easy to answer, I shall put my answer to it in my own words. b

The question whether the discrimination would have been unlawful resolves itself into two questions, but not quite the same two as the judge posed. He asked himself:

'(1) Were the Watsons concerned with the provision of facilities or services? If so, (2) was such provision to a section of the public?'

This approach followed this court's approach in Charter's case¹; but it has been corrected by the House of Lords² since the judge gave his judgment. 'Facilities or service' are very wide words and it is not helpful to consider their meaning in isolation from 'the public or a section of the public' to which they have to be provided. These last are words of limitation. I said in Charter's case³: c

'The question is not whether . . . the club committee is concerned with some form of public or quasi-public activity in providing facilities, but whether the members and visitors to whom they provide them are a section of the public.' d

But the House of Lords corrected that by saying, as Lord Cross of Chelsea⁴ did, that only the 'public' provision as opposed to the 'private' provision of facilities and services was within the section. I therefore consider the first question to be: were the Watsons concerned with the provision of facilities or services to a section of the public? My second question is then one which is bound up with the question on which the judge did not find it necessary to express any view: if incitement had been successful would the Watsons have discriminated against any person seeking to obtain or use those facilities or services? e

In spite of counsel for the first defendant's rigorous submissions, I answer both questions in the affirmative. The Watsons were, and are, providing a valuable public service in fostering children in the care of the Barnet Borough Council, the Haringey Borough Council and the Hertfordshire County Council under the Children Act 1948, and the Boarding-Out of Children Regulations 1955. Many of the facilities or services they provide (and I think that they provide both) are like those given as examples in s 2 (2) of the 1968 Act: accommodation, entertainment, recreation, refreshment, even education. At the base of them all they are providing each foster child with a temporary home by taking him or her 'to live in their dwelling as a member of their family' to be cared for and brought up as they would a child of their own: see reg 1 and the form of undertaking set out in the schedule which foster parents are required to give by reg 20. In providing that home they are like parents adopting children under the Adoption Act 1958 or fostering them by private arrangement under the Children Act 1958—or indeed like natural parents bringing up their own children. But between those categories of parents and what they are concerned with providing for a few children and the Watsons and what they have provided for some 300 children in 23 years there are obvious important differences, as Lord Denning MR has indicated. Whereas the activities of all the others may be regarded as private, the Watsons are taking part in a statutory scheme and a public service. Their names and addresses as foster parents are entered in a register which a local authority is required by reg 11 to keep in respect of every child boarded out in their area. They have 'gone public' and they offer to three local authorities and the children f a in their area in need of foster care the provision of their services to the children they in fact foster. Those children whom they foster are, in my judgment, a section of the public, and not disqualified from being so by their numbers or by their personal relationship to the Watsons, which led the judge to hold that they were not. (I share the doubts of Lord Denning MR whether the local authority are a section of the public.) If persons—private persons as distinct from public authorities or even voluntary organisations—are willing to foster children ‘for love’ and without payment, it may seem a private and domestic matter whom they foster and on what grounds they select those they undertake to treat as their own children. But in helping local authorities to carry out their statutory duty to care for children in their areas, public-spirited persons like the Watsons are performing a public service and will not be surprised to find that Parliament has made unlawful a discrimination which they themselves would seem to regard as wrong. But that discrimination is unlawful if it is—

d ‘against any person seeking to obtain or use those goods, facilities or services by refusing or deliberately omitting to provide him with any of them or to provide him with goods, services or facilities of the like quality, in the like manner and on the like terms in and on which the former normally makes them available to other members of the public.’

The words certainly suggest discrimination against an individual member of the public, as counsel for the first defendant contended; but after some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that counsel for the plaintiffs is right in submitting that there is nothing in their context to prevent them applying to a body corporate such as a limited company or a local authority. If it were necessary to apply s 19 of the Interpretation Act 1889, I would do so.

e The persons who seek to obtain or use the services which the Watsons are concerned with providing are the three local authorities who send them children to board and foster. The persons who obtain and use them are the foster children boarded out with the Watsons. If the position is as simple as that and that is a complete account of it, then it is necessary to decide (what counsel for the first defendant has conceded) that A can discriminate against B on the ground of C’s colour, race or ethnic or national origin. If that were necessary I would so decide in agreement with Lord Denning MR. But it is, in my opinion, unnecessary because on reflection I consider the position to be that the children in need of fostering as well as the local authority are persons seeking to obtain and use the Watsons’ child-fostering services. I see nothing in the fact that the children may not themselves seek fostering, or may even object to the home the Watsons provide, or in the fact that the local authorities are performing a statutory duty, which prevents the local authorities from seeking those services on the children’s behalf. The Children Act 1948 imposes on them a parental duty, and there is no need to decide the other question whether the Race Relations Act 1968 forbids discrimination against a corporation, because in discriminating against a local authority a foster parent would be discriminating also against the children in need of fostering.

h In my judgment therefore a refusal or a deliberate omission by the Watsons to foster children on the ground of colour would be discrimination against the children as well as against the local authorities and would contravene the statute.

i Appeal allowed. Declaration as prayed granted, that the acts referred to in para 4 of the particulars of claim were unlawful by virtue of ss 2 and 12 of the Race Relations Act 1968. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, MACKENNA AND BEAN JJ

24th MAY 1973

Criminal law – Sentence – Suspended sentence – Fresh offence committed during period of suspension – Extension of period of suspended sentence – Imposition of immediate sentence of imprisonment for fresh offence – Undesirability of subjecting accused to immediate and suspended sentences at same time – Criminal Justice Act 1967, s 40 (1) (c).

When sentencing an accused during the operational period of a suspended sentence imposed on him for a previous conviction, the judge should in general avoid 'mixing' suspended and immediate sentences of imprisonment. Where, therefore, the judge is minded to impose an immediate sentence for the subsequent offence he should, as a general rule, activate the suspended sentence, either to run concurrently or consecutively, rather than extend the operational period of the suspended sentence under s 40 (1) (c) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967.

Appeal

On 24th October 1972 in the Crown Court at Sheffield before May J and a jury, Paul William Goodlad was convicted of causing grievous bodily harm contrary to s 20 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. He was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment and it was further ordered that a suspended sentence of six months' imprisonment imposed on the appellant on 25th May 1972 should run for a period of two years from 24th October 1972. By leave of James LJ the appellant appealed against sentence. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

W B Phillips for the appellant.

The Crown was not represented.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. On 25th May 1972 at Rotherham Borough Magistrates' Court this appellant Goodlad was convicted of two offences of burglary, and was sentenced to concurrent sentences of six months' imprisonment suspended for two years. On 24th October 1972 at Sheffield Crown Court he pleaded guilty to an offence of causing grievous bodily harm, and in relation to that offence he was sentenced by May J to 18 months' imprisonment, and I say at once that we have heard no word to suggest that there was anything wrong with that sentence so far as the offence of grievous bodily harm was concerned, because it was a serious case of grievous a bodily harm and the appellant can regard himself as fortunate not to have received a heavier sentence in respect of it.

Having decided to sentence him to 18 months' imprisonment for the grievous bodily harm, the learned judge then had to decide what to do about the suspended sentence, because the grievous bodily harm was an offence committed during the operative period of that suspended sentence. What he said, and I take it from the transcript, was:

b '... I think that it would be in all the circumstances unjust to activate the suspended sentence, but I propose to make it run for a period of two years from today. For the present offence, making the sentence as lenient as I can, because this was a serious injury, you must go to prison for 18 months.'

c So in regard to the suspended sentence the learned judge was keeping it in suspense, but was increasing the operational period during which a further offence might give rise to the activation of that suspended sentence. Let it be said at once that the learned judge was within his rights in law in doing what he did. It is perfectly clear under s 40 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 that whereas the ordinary course when a further offence is committed during the operational period of a suspended sentence is to activate that suspended sentence, the trial judge has certain alternatives, and the third alternative in s 40 (1) (c) is that he may by order vary the original order of a suspended sentence by substituting for the period specified therein a period expiring not later than three years from the date of the variation. That is exactly what he did, and there is no doubt whatever that what he did was within the strict letter of the law.

d The complaint therefore is not that the judge erred in law, but that he failed to follow what this court has laid down over the last few years as being the desirable practice in regard to the treatment of suspended sentences. What is submitted is that he should not have left the sentence in suspense, and added to the operational period, but should have activated it, the reason being that the court has generally set its face against a situation in which one man is subject to an immediate prison sentence and a suspended prison sentence at the same time.

e That the court has set its face against that kind of situation is perfectly clear from the reports. The first authority to which we have been referred is *R v Sapiano*¹. There the court was dealing with this problem, I think for the first time, and Lord Parker CJ, speaking in general terms of a sentence in which a suspended and an immediate sentence were imposed at the same time, said this²:

f 'The Court is satisfied that it is a wrong sentence, wrong in two respects, first that it is really against the spirit and intention of the Act, because the main object of a suspended sentence is to avoid sending an offender to prison at all; secondly, it is wrong because in many circumstances it just will not work.'

g We have therefore a clear statement of principle that when a judge is imposing sentences in respect of two offences, he should not mix up, as a learned Lord Justice subsequently described it, immediate and suspended sentences by imposing one type of sentence for one offence and another for the other; he should bear in mind that the purpose of the suspended sentence procedure is to avoid sending people to prison. He should make up his mind whether on the case as a whole prison is inevitable or not. If he thinks prison is inevitable he should pass immediate prison sentences in respect of both offences. If he considers that prison is avoidable he should deal with the offence by suspended sentences. That is the practice in the simple case where the judge is dealing with two offences at the same time.

j What of the present case where the judge is imposing a sentence for a new offence but has also to deal with a suspended sentence previously imposed? We think that the principle of endeavouring to avoid a mixing up of immediate and suspended sentences should be observed in this instance as well. In reaching that conclusion, we are mindful of the fact that under the terms of s 40 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 a court dealing with a previous suspended sentence is required to activate that sentence unless one of the alternatives in the section is necessary in the interests of justice. Accordingly, it seems to us that a judge in the position of May J in the present case should have approached the problem of the suspended sentence with s 40 in mind, that is to say bearing in mind that an activation of the suspended sentence was prima facie what was required.

2 (1968) 52 Cr App Rep at 675

The second reason why we think that in general the principle enunciated by Lord Parker CJ in *R v Sapiano*¹ should apply to this kind of case is that the inconvenience, and indeed the impracticability, of working an immediate prison sentence with a suspended sentence arises as much in this kind of situation as it does where a judge imposes sentences of different kinds initially and on the same occasion.

Hence we think that the general practice to which I have referred should be reflected in the type of case before this learned judge as well. I would like to make it perfectly clear that it is not to be assumed that in no case can an immediate and a suspended sentence live together. To quote one example, if a man receives a suspended sentence for a relatively minor offence in January and then in March of the same year is convicted of a serious offence committed before the suspended sentence was imposed, then the court may have no alternative but to sentence him to an immediate term for the later serious offence notwithstanding that the undesirable mixing up will result. But in cases where that result can be avoided, we think in practice it should be avoided, and we think that the present is such a case. Accordingly, in our judgment if the learned judge had followed this principle, he would have decided in the present instance to avoid having a suspended and an immediate prison sentence working together; he would have avoided it by deciding to activate the suspended sentence, and in the view of this court he certainly would not have done injustice in the present instance if he had ordered that the six months' suspended sentence should take effect consecutively to the 18 months for the grievous bodily harm. Whether he would have done that or not if he decided to activate the sentence we do not know, but it is clear that we cannot do it, because the powers of this court are limited to imposing a sentence not more severe than that which was imposed in the courts below.

For those reasons, and despite the fact that the appellant may regard himself as a very lucky man, we have decided to allow this appeal against sentence, to activate the suspended sentence, and to order that it be served concurrently with the sentence of 18 months imposed in respect of the grievous bodily harm.

Appeal allowed; sentence varied.

Re Manisty's Settlement

CHANCERY DIVISION

TEMPLEMAN J

b 6th MARCH, 2nd MAY 1973

Settlement – Power – Intermediate power – Validity – Power conferred on trustees to nominate and add to a class of beneficiaries – Power exercisable in favour of anyone with certain exceptions – Whether valid.

- c By cl 4 and 15 of a settlement made in 1971, the settlor conferred on the trustees for the time being, provided they included at least one trustee who was not a beneficiary, power at their absolute discretion to pay, apply, appoint or settle the trust funds for the benefit of any of the beneficiaries, the power being exercisable until the closing date, defined by cl 1 as the date of the expiry of the period of 79 years from the execution of the settlement, or such earlier date as the trustees declared.
- d The original beneficiaries were defined by cl 1 as the two existing infant children of the settlor, his future children and remoter issue born before the closing date and his two brothers and their children and remoter issue born before the closing date. It was provided that every person who was for the time being a member of the excepted class should be excluded from the class of beneficiaries. The original excepted class defined by cl 1 comprised the settlor, the wife for the time being of the settlor, any other person or corporation settling property on the trusts of the settlement and the spouse of any such other settlor. Clause 4 (a) (iii) conferred on the trustees power by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable to declare that any person or persons, corporation or corporations or charity or charities (other than a member of the excepted class or one of the trustees) should thenceforth for a specified period (not extending beyond the closing date) be included in the class of beneficiaries, with the proviso that such deed should not take effect unless and until the same (or a memorandum stating the effect thereof) had been endorsed on the settlement. In 1972, by a deed of declaration, a memorandum of which was endorsed on the settlement, the trustees, in purported exercise of the power conferred on them by cl 4 (a) (iii) declared that there should thenceforth be included in the class of 'beneficiaries' as defined in the settlement, the settlor's mother and any person who should for the time being be the widow of the settlor. Doubts having arisen as to the validity of the power contained in cl 4 (a) (iii), and, consequently, as to the effectiveness of the 1972 declaration, the trustees took out a summons to determine whether the power was valid or not. It was argued on behalf of the original beneficiaries that the power to add further beneficiaries was invalid, because an intermediate power, i.e. a power exercisable in favour of anyone with certain exceptions, could not be conferred on trustees because of the principles of non-delegation, and uncertainty.
- g
- h

j Held – (i) The settlor was not precluded by the doctrine of non-delegation from conferring an intermediate power on his trustees since it was established that a testator, and a fortiori a settlor, could create powers of disposition exercisable by individuals or trustees without thereby infringing the rule against delegation (see p 1206 g and j, post).

(ii) The power conferred by cl 4 (a) (iii) was not invalid for uncertainty for the following reasons—

(a) A special power in favour of a class was valid if it could be said with certainty that any given person was or was not a member of the class; likewise an intermediate power was valid provided that, having regard to the definition of the excepted persons, it could be said with certainty that any given individual was or was not an object of the power (see p 1207 b and c, post).

(b) A power could not be held to be uncertain merely because it was wide in ambit since the mere width of a power could not make it impossible for the trustees to perform their duty nor prevent the court from determining whether the trustees were in breach (see p 1207 h and p 1208 g, post).

(c) Neither could it be argued that an intermediate power was too vague in that it did not attempt to classify beneficiaries. The settlor was entitled to confer an absolute discretion on his trustees and trustees on whom an intermediate power had been conferred were not precluded from considering in a sensible manner whether and how to exercise the power. It was not necessary that the terms of the power should provide guidance to them on how to exercise the power; nor was it the case that only a special power in favour of a recognised class enabled the court to judge whether the trustees were in breach of duty. The court could not insist on a particular exercise of a special power; the only duty on which the court could insist was that the trustees should consider exercising the power and in particular consider a request from a person within the ambit of the power that the power should be exercised in his favour. Accordingly the duties of the trustees of an intermediate power were precisely similar to those of the trustees of a special power as were the rights and remedies of a person who wished the power to be exercised in his favour (see p 1209 c and g, p 1210 b and f to j and p 1211 c, post).

(iii) It followed therefore that, since there was no logical objection to intermediate powers and the court was not constrained by the authorities to strike down a power which a settlor, disposing of his own property under skilled advice, wished to confer, the power conferred on the trustees under cl 4 (a) (iii) of the settlement was valid (see p 1211 f and p 1213 g, post).

Adjourned summons

- This was an application by originating summons by the plaintiffs, Henry Francis Herbert Manisty (a brother of the first defendant, Edward Alexander Manisty, the settlor) and Mark Rider Cheyne (the present trustees of a settlement dated 20th December 1971 and made between the first defendant and the plaintiffs), whereby the plaintiffs sought the determination by the court of the question (a) whether the power expressed to be conferred on them as trustees of the settlement by cl 4 (a) (iii) thereof to add to the class of 'beneficiaries' as defined in the settlement was (i) valid or (ii) void for uncertainty or otherwise, and (b) if the power was valid, whether the deed of declaration dated 8th December 1972 made by the plaintiffs (i) operated to add to the class of 'beneficiaries' as defined in the settlement for the period specified in the deed, the settlor's mother, Charlotte Evelyn Stephens, the third defendant, and any widow for the time being of the settlor, or (ii) was ineffective for that purpose. The settlor's wife, Dinah Lake Manisty, was the second defendant, his infant children, Alexander Manisty and Louisa Manisty, were the fourth and fifth defendants, and his other brother, Michael Christopher Manisty, was the sixth defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment.

2nd May. TEMPLEMAN J read the following judgment. This summons challenges the validity of a power conferred on trustees to nominate and add to a class of beneficiaries.

- f* By the settlement dated 20th December 1971 the settlor, who is the first defendant, appointed his brother Henry and a chartered accountant, who are the two plaintiffs, to be the first trustees, and by cl 4, read with cl 15, conferred on the trustees, for the time being, provided that they include at least one trustee who is not a beneficiary, power at their absolute discretion to pay, apply, appoint or settle the trust funds for the benefit of any of the beneficiaries. The power is exercisable during a perpetuity period, that is to say, until the closing date defined by cl 1 as the date of the expiry of the period of 79 years from the execution of the settlement, or such earlier date as the trustees declare. The original beneficiaries were defined by cl 1 as the two existing infant children of the settlor, the future children and remoter issue of the settlor born before the closing date, the settlor's two brothers, Michael and Henry, and their children and remoter issue born before the closing date. It was provided that 'every person who is for the time being a member of the Excepted Class shall be excluded from the class of Beneficiaries'.

- g* The original excepted class defined by cl 1 comprised the settlor, the wife for the time being of the settlor, any other person or corporation settling property on the trusts of the settlement and the spouse of any such other settlor. Clause 4, as limited by cl 15, also authorised the trustees, if they include at least one trustee who is not a beneficiary, to delete any person or corporation from the beneficiaries, to add any person, corporation or class to the excepted class and at their absolute discretion to exercise the power which is now challenged, and which, comprising cl 4 (a) (iii), reads as follows:

'Power by any Deed or Deeds revocable or irrevocable to declare that any person or persons corporation or corporations or charity or charities (other than a person or corporation who shall for the time being be a member of the Excepted Class or one of the Trustees) shall thenceforth and for such period as shall be specified in such Deed or Deeds (not extending beyond the Closing Date) be included in the class of Beneficiaries hereinbefore defined PROVIDED ALWAYS that any such Deed shall not take effect unless and until the same (or a memorandum stating the effect thereof) has been endorsed on this Settlement'.^a

Subject to the powers of disposition conferred on the trustees, and to a trust for accumulation for 21 years, the trust funds, which in the first instance consisted of policies of assurance on the life of the settlor, were settled by cl 3 (2) on such of the children of the existing children of the settlor as shall be living on the closing date, or shall previously attain the age of 21 years, or if there shall be no such grandchildren of the settlor then by cl 3 (3) on such of the existing children as attain 21.^b

By a deed of declaration dated 8th December 1972, a memorandum of which was endorsed on the settlement and dated 11th December 1972, the trustees, who included one person who was not a beneficiary, added to the beneficiaries the mother of the settlor and any person who shall for the time being be the widow of the settlor. The settlor's wife, who may become his widow, and the settlor's mother are the second and third defendants and appear by Mr Cozens-Hardy Horne to uphold the validity of the power to add beneficiaries and the validity of the deed of declaration which exercised that power.^c

The settlor's two existing infant children are the fourth and fifth defendants and they appear by Mr Bradburn to argue in the interests of all the original beneficiaries that the power to add further beneficiaries is invalid and the deed of declaration is ineffective. The sixth defendant is Michael, the brother of the settlor, and has taken no part in the argument.^d

The power to add beneficiaries and to benefit the persons so added is exercisable in favour of anyone in the world except the settlor, his wife, the other members of the excepted class for the time being and the trustees, other than the settlor's brother Henry who was one of the original beneficiaries. This is not a general power exercisable in favour of anyone, nor a special power exercisable in favour of a class, but an intermediate power exercisable in favour of anyone, with certain exceptions.^e

Counsel for the fourth and fifth defendants submits that an intermediate power cannot be conferred on trustees because of principles of non-delegation and uncertainty. The argument based on the principle of non-delegation stems from the proposition that a testator must not delegate to other persons the right to make a will for him. It is, however, established by authority that a testator, and a fortiori a settlor, may create powers of disposition exercisable by individuals or by trustees without thereby infringing any rule against delegation. If delegation is the vice then delegation to an individual is as bad as delegation to a trustee. But in *Re Park*¹ Clauson J held valid an intermediate power conferred by a testator on an individual to appoint to anyone in the world, except the donee of the power. If delegation is the vice then delegation to trustees by means of a special power is as bad as delegation to trustees by means of an intermediate power. But in *Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts*² the House of Lords held valid a special power conferred by a settlor on trustees to benefit the settlor's son and his associates. To make assurance double sure, in *Re Abrahams' Will Trusts*³ Cross J held valid an intermediate power conferred by a testator on trustees to appoint to anyone in the world except the trustees, and he expressly rejected the argument based on the principle of non-delegation. I conclude that the settlor in the present case was not precluded by the doctrine of non-delegation from conferring an intermediate power on his trustees.^f a The argument based on uncertainty is that the trustees are under a duty to consider from time to time whether and how to exercise their powers, and that they cannot perform that duty, and a court cannot judge the performance of that duty, if the power is too wide. An intermediate power, it is said, is wider than any special power and is practically unlimited, and is therefore too wide, uncertain and invalid.

b Invalidity, based on uncertainty, was the subject of *Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts*¹, relating to special powers in favour of a class, and *McPhail v Doulton*², relating to discretionary trusts in favour of a class. Those authorities establish that such a power or trust is valid if it can be said with certainty that any given individual is or is not a member of the class. The principle of the rule thus established does not strike down an intermediate power provided that, having regard to the definition of excepted persons, it can be said with certainty that any given individual is or is not an object of the power. The principle for which counsel for the second defendant contends may be adopted from the summary of the effect of *Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts*¹ to be found in the dissenting speech of Lord Guest in *McPhail v Doulton*³ where he said:

'In the case of a power it is only necessary for the trustees to know whether a particular individual does or does not come within the ambit of the power.'

d Counsel for the second defendant says, applying that principle to the present case, the definition of excepted class being certain, it follows that there is no uncertainty about the power.

e *Gulbenkian*¹ and *McPhail v Doulton*² also establish, or rather reiterate, the rule that trustees of a power must consider from time to time whether and how to exercise the power, for in the words of Lord Reid in *Gulbenkian*⁴:

f 'A settlor or testator who entrusts a power to his trustees must be relying on them in their fiduciary capacity so they cannot simply push aside the power and refuse to consider whether it ought in their judgment to be exercised. And they cannot give money to a person who is not within the classes of persons designated by the settlor: the construction of the power is for the court.'

In *McPhail v Doulton*⁵ Lord Wilberforce, referring to special powers, suggested:

g 'Any trustee would surely make it his duty to know what is the permissible area of selection and then consider responsibly, in individual cases, whether a contemplated beneficiary was within the power and whether, in relation to other possible claimants, a particular grant was appropriate.'

He added⁶, referring to special powers and to discretionary trusts in favour of a class, that 'in each case the trustees ought to make such a survey of the range of objects or possible beneficiaries as will enable them to carry out their fiduciary duty'.

h It is said that if a power is too wide the trustees cannot perform the duty reiterated in *Gulbenkian*¹ and *McPhail v Doulton*² of considering from time to time whether and how to exercise the power and the court cannot determine whether or not the trustees are in breach of their duty. In my judgment, however, the mere width of a power cannot make it impossible for trustees to perform their duty nor prevent the court from determining whether the trustees are in breach.

In *Re Gestetner (deceased)*¹, the trustees were given a power exercisable in favour of a class which excluded the settlor, his wife and the trustees and comprised four named individuals, the living and future descendants of the settlor's father and of an uncle of the settlor, the spouses, widows and widowers of those individuals and descendants, five named charitable bodies, former employees of the settlor or his wife and the widows and widowers of former employees of the settlor or his wife and any person who was for the time being a director or employee or former director or employee or the wife or husband or widow or widower of a former director or employee of Gestetner Ltd or of any company of which the directors for the time being included any one or more of the persons who were for the time being directors of Gestetner Ltd.

This was a special power exercisable over an enormous class, and the great majority of beneficiaries by number and category will never learn that they are objects of the power or fall to be considered by the trustees. If a director of Gestetner Ltd became a director of Woolworth or Unilever there would be added to the class of beneficiaries shop assistants throughout England and workers throughout the world. *Gestetner*² was approved in *Gulbenkian*³ and does not exhaust the ingenuity of settlors in creating classes and numbers of beneficiaries of immeasurable width.

The argument that a discretionary trust in favour of a recognised class can be too wide was considered in *Re Baden's Deed Trusts (No 2)*⁴, a decision which for present purposes must apply to special powers as well as to discretionary trusts. In *Baden (No 2)*⁴ it was submitted that a discretionary trust exercisable in favour of employees and former employees of a company and their relatives and dependants was void for uncertainty because it did not satisfy the test suggested in the judgment of Brightman J⁵, namely, that such a trust is—

'invalid if the class is so large or arbitrary that the trustees cannot reasonably estimate the membership, or know how to set about instituting enquiries which will reveal the membership, including the membership of its sub-classes or categories, and if the trustees cannot therefore properly discharge their duty to consider how the fund should be divided between the sub-classes or categories, and what further enquiries they should make.'

The suggested test only serves to illustrate how impossible it is to define the circumstances in which a recognised class may be said to be too wide. Brightman J rejected the test and held that the discretionary trust was valid, applying only the test established in *McPhail v Doulton*⁶ that a trust in favour of a recognised class is valid if it can be said with certainty that any given individual is or is not a member of the class. The decision of Brightman J in *Baden (No 2)*⁴ was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. I conclude from *Gestetner*², *Gulbenkian*³, *McPhail v Doulton*⁶ and *Baden (No 2)*⁷, that a power cannot be uncertain merely because it is wide in ambit.

An alternative argument against the validity of an intermediate power conferred on trustees is that a power which is not confined to individuals or to classes recognised by the court is too vague. An intermediate power which does not attempt to classify the beneficiaries but only specifies or classifies excepted persons is therefore, it is said, too vague. It is admitted that it may be difficult to define or describe those classes which would not be recognised by the court, and are therefore also too vague, but the example suggested by Lord Wilberforce in *McPhail v Doulton*⁸ of 'all the a residents of Greater London' is given as an instance of a class which would not be so recognised.

The submission that an intermediate power is too vague because the beneficiaries are not limited to specified individuals or recognised classes is in the final analysis based on the same reasoning as the attack on wide discretionary trusts which was rejected in *Baden (No 2)*¹. The argument is that an intermediate power where the

b beneficiaries are not limited to specified individuals or recognised classes precludes the trustees from considering in a sensible manner whether and how to exercise the power, and prevents the court from judging whether the trustees have surveyed the field of objects and have properly considered whether and how to exercise the power.

c Implicit in this argument are two assertions, first, that the terms of a special power in favour of recognised classes necessarily provide some guidance to the trustees with regard to the proper mode of considering how to exercise the power, and secondly, that the terms of a special power in favour of recognised classes enable the court to judge whether the trustees are in breach of their duty. In my judgment neither assertion is well founded.

d Some powers may give an indication of the expectations of the settlor. In *Gulbenkian*² it was plain that the trustees were expected to have regard to the best interests of Mr Nubar Gulbenkian. There are similar powers where all the beneficiaries are equal but some are more equal than others. But in *Gestetner*³ it was impossible to derive any assistance from the terms of the power, save that the trustees, it could be assumed, were expected to have regard to the considerations which might move the settlor to confer bounty on the beneficiaries. A similar expectation may be implied from an intermediate power, and in the present case if the settlement is read

e as a whole the expectations of the settlor are not difficult to discern. In *Gestetner*³ the terms of the power did not in themselves indicate how employees were to be compared with relations, charities, individuals and other classes of beneficiaries. The terms of the power in themselves did not indicate whether and on what grounds one employee might be considered, whether by reference to services rendered to f Gestetner Ltd or to the settlor or by reference to age, health or any other criterion. The terms of the power did not in themselves indicate whether and on what grounds one relation out of many was to be considered, whether by reference to his proximity to the settlor, poverty, educational requirements or any other circumstances. The terms of a special power do not necessarily indicate in themselves how the trustees are to consider the exercise of the power. That consideration is confided to the absolute discretion of the trustees.

g The court cannot insist on any particular consideration being given by the trustees to the exercise of the power. If a settlor creates a power exercisable in favour of his issue, his relations and the employees of his company, the trustees may in practice for many years hold regular meetings, study the terms of the power and the other provisions of the settlement, examine the accounts and either decide not to exercise the power or to exercise it only in favour, for example, of the children of h the settlor. During that period the existence of the power may not be disclosed to any relation or employee and the trustees may not seek or receive any information concerning the circumstances of any relation or employee. In my judgment it cannot be said that the trustees in those circumstances have committed a breach of trust and that they ought to have advertised the power or looked beyond the persons who are most likely to be the objects of the bounty of the settlor. The trustees

i are, of course, at liberty to make further enquiries, but cannot be compelled to do so at the behest of any beneficiary. The court cannot judge the adequacy of the consideration given by the trustees to the exercise of the power, and it cannot insist on the trustees applying a particular principle or any principle in reaching a decision. a

3 [1953] 1 All ER 1150, [1953] Ch 672

If a person within the ambit of the power is aware of its existence he can require the trustees to consider exercising the power and in particular to consider a request on his part for the power to be exercised in his favour. The trustees must consider this request, and if they decline to do so or can be proved to have omitted to do so, then the aggrieved person may apply to the court which may remove the trustees and appoint others in their place. This, as I understand it, is the only right and only remedy of any object of the power: see, for example, *Gestetner*¹, where Harman J said that the trustees— b

‘are not entitled entirely to release the power. That means that they are bound to consider at all times during which the trust is to continue whether or no they are to distribute any, and, if so, what, part of the fund, and to whom they should distribute it. To that extent I have no doubt that there is a duty on these trustees, and that a member of the specified class might, if he could show that the trustees had deliberately refused to consider any question of the want or suitability of any member of the class, procure their removal . . . there is no obligation on the trustees to do more than consider from time to time the merits of such persons of the specified class as are known to them, and, if they consider them meritorious, to give them something. The settlor had good reason to trust the persons whom he appointed as trustees, I have no doubt, but I cannot see that there is here such a duty as makes it essential for these trustees, before parting with any income or capital, to survey the whole field and consider whether A is more deserving of bounty than B. That is a task which is, and which must have been known to the settlor to be impossible, having regard to the ramifications of the persons who might be members of this class.’ c

Similarly, in the case of an intermediate power the settlor has no doubt good reason to trust the persons whom he appoints trustees. In my judgment the reasoning is parallel. d

The court may also be persuaded to intervene by removing the trustees if the trustees act ‘capriciously’, that is to say, act for reasons which I apprehend could be said to be irrational, perverse or irrelevant to any sensible expectation of the settlor; for example, if they chose a beneficiary by height or complexion or by the irrelevant fact that he was a resident of Greater London. e

A special power does not show the trustees how to consider the exercise of the power in a sensible manner and does not by its terms enable the court to judge whether the power is being considered in a proper manner. The conduct and duties of trustees of an intermediate power, and the rights and remedies of any person who wishes the power to be exercised in his favour, are precisely similar to the conduct and duties of trustees of special powers and the rights and remedies of any person who wishes a special power to be exercised in his favour. In practice, the considerations which weigh with the trustees will be no different from the considerations which will weigh with the trustees of a wide special power. In both cases reasonable trustees will endeavour, no doubt, to give effect to the intention of the settlor in making the settlement and will derive that intention not from the terms of the power necessarily or exclusively, but from all the terms of the settlement, the surrounding circumstances and their individual knowledge acquired or inherited. In both cases the trustees have an absolute discretion and cannot be obliged to take any form of action, save to consider the exercise of the power and a request from a person who is within the ambit of the power. In practice, requests to trustees armed f

- a* with an intermediate power are unlikely to come from anyone who has no claim on the bounty of the settlor. In practice, requests to trustees armed with a special power in favour, for example, of issue, relations and employees of a company, are unlikely to come from anyone who has no claim on the bounty of the settlor, or has no plausible grounds for being given a benefit from property derived from the settlor. The only difference between an intermediate power and a special power for present purposes is that a settlor by means of a special power cannot be certain that he has armed his trustees against all developments and contingencies. A settlor who creates a special power exercisable in favour of issue, relations and employees may later regret that the trustees have no power to benefit adopted issue, widows and other persons outside the ambit of the power. Hence the recent popularity, as I am informed, of intermediate powers which arm the trustees with a weapon which will enable them to consider all developments, and all future mishaps and disasters.

- c* Logically, in my judgment, there is no reason to bless a special power which prescribes the ambit of the power by classifying beneficiaries and at the same time to outlaw an intermediate power which prescribes the ambit of the power by classifying excepted persons.

- d* It may well be that there are some classes of special power which will not be recognised by the court, but this possibility does not affect the validity of intermediate powers. The objection to the capricious exercise of a power may well extend to the creation of a capricious power. A power to benefit 'residents of Greater London' is capricious because the terms of the power negative any sensible intention on the part of the settlor. If the settlor intended and expected the trustees would have regard to persons with some claim on his bounty or some interest in an institution favoured by the settlor, or if the settlor had any other sensible intention or expectation, he would not have required the trustees to consider only an accidental conglomeration of persons who have no discernible link with the settlor or with any institution. A capricious power negatives a sensible consideration by the trustees of the exercise of the power. But a wide power, be it special or intermediate, does not negative or prohibit a sensible approach by the trustees to the consideration and exercise of their powers.

- f* If there is no logical objection to intermediate powers it remains to be considered whether the authorities, for historical or other reasons, forbid the conferment of intermediate powers on trustees. In *Morice v The Bishop of Durham*¹ a trust for 'such objects of benevolence and liberality as the trustee in his own discretion shall most approve' was held to be invalid and Lord Eldon LC said this:

- g* 'As it is a maxim, that the execution of a trust shall be under the controul of the Court, it must be of such a nature, that it can be under that controul; so that the administration of it can be reviewed by the Court; or, if the trustee dies, the Court itself can execute the trust: a trust therefore, which, in case of mal-administration could be reformed; and a due administration directed; and then, unless the subjects and the objects can be ascertained, upon principles, familiar in other cases, it must be decided, that the Court can neither reform mal-administration, nor direct a due administration.'

- j* The decision in that case does not touch the present controversy. In a trust where the objects are described by vague adjectives such as 'benevolent' and 'liberal' the trust breaks the rule that the trustees and the court must be able to determine with certainty whether a particular individual or a particular object is within the ambit of the power. Nor does an intermediate power break the principles laid down by Lord Eldon LC in the passage which I have read because, in relation to a power exercisable by the trustees at their absolute discretion, the only 'control' exercisable by the court is the removal of the trustees, and the only 'due administration' which can be 'directed' is an order requiring the trustees to consider the exercise of the power, and in particular a request from a person within the ambit of the power. This control and direction may be exercised by the court in relation to a power, whether special or intermediate.

In *Re Park*¹ Clauson J held that an intermediate power exercisable by an individual was valid, but he said²:

'It is clearly settled that if a testator creates a trust he must mark out the metes and bounds which are to fetter the trustees or, as has been said, the trust must not be too vague for the Court to enforce, and that is why a gift to trustees for such purposes as they may in their discretion think fit is an invalid trust; there are no metes and bounds within which the trust can be defined, and unless the trust can be defined the Court cannot enforce it.'

If the object of metes and bounds is to enable the trustees and the court to determine whether an individual is or is not a beneficiary then an intermediate power satisfies that test. If the requirement of certainty is the same as that mentioned by Lord Eldon LC in *Morice v The Bishop of Durham*³ this passage from the judgment of Clauson J² does not affect powers, whether special or intermediate, where the only 'enforcement' allowed to the court is enforcement of the right of any person within the ambit of the power to require the trustees to consider the exercise of the power and his request. If the passage means more than this, it nevertheless does not in terms apply to powers, and even in relation to trusts may be required to be reconsidered in the light of the consequences of the decision of the majority of the House of Lords in *McPhail v Doulton*⁴.

In *Re Abrahams' Will Trusts*⁵ Cross J considered *Re Park*¹ and decided that an intermediate power exercisable by trustees was valid. Counsel for the fourth and fifth defendants points out that *Re Abrahams' Will Trusts*⁶ was decided before the decision of the House of Lords in *Gulbenkian*⁷, but it is plain that the judgment of Cross J⁶ is not inconsistent with *Gulbenkian*⁷ and he discussed the nature of a power and the duty of the trustees in words which anticipated both *Gulbenkian*⁷ and *McPhail v Doulton*⁸. The learned judge said⁹:

'It is not a trust imposed on them; it is a mere power. It is a fiduciary power given to them in the capacity of trustees and they cannot release it. They must retain it unless and until they exercise it, and consider from time to time whether they ought to exercise it.'

The learned judge clearly did not envisage that the trustees' function, to which he alluded in terms anticipating *Gulbenkian*⁷ and *McPhail v Doulton*⁸, would be difficult or impossible for trustees to carry out in connection with an intermediate power, and clearly did not envisage that the court would find any difficulty in carrying out its limited function with regard to the exercise by the trustees of powers.

In *McPhail v Doulton*¹⁰ Lord Wilberforce referred first to 'linguistic or semantic uncertainty which, if unresolved by the court, renders the gift void' and secondly to—

- a 'the difficulty of ascertaining the existence or whereabouts of members of the class, a matter with which the court can appropriately deal on an application for directions.'

Then he said this¹:

- b 'There may be a third case where the meaning of the words used is clear but the definition of beneficiaries is so hopelessly wide as not to form "anything like a class" so that the trust is administratively unworkable or in Lord Eldon LC's words one that cannot be executed.'

And he cited *Morice v The Bishop of Durham*². He continued¹:

- c 'I hesitate to give examples for they may prejudice future cases, but perhaps "all the residents of Greater London" will serve. I do not think that a discretionary trust for "relatives" even of a living person falls within this category.'

- d In these guarded terms Lord Wilberforce appears to refer to trusts which may have to be executed and administered by the court and not to powers where the court has a very much more limited function. Moreover, a capricious power exercisable in favour of 'residents of Greater London' may, as I have already outlined, well be uncertain. The settlor neither gives the trustees an unlimited power which they can exercise sensibly, nor a power limited to what may be described a 'sensible' class, but a power limited to a class, membership of which is accidental and irrelevant to any settled purpose or to any method of limiting or selecting beneficiaries.

- e Finally, in *Blausten v Inland Revenue Comrs*³, there are passages which are admittedly obiter to the decision of Buckley LJ, in which the learned Lord Justice accepted the validity of an intermediate power exercisable by trustees with the consent of the settlor but was clearly not disposed to accept the validity of an intermediate power exercisable by trustees at their sole discretion. The full consequences and implications of *Gestetner*⁴, *Gulbenkian*⁵, *McPhail v Doulton*⁶ and *Baden (No 2)*⁷ do not, however, appear to have been fully explored for the assistance of Buckley LJ and that is not surprising in view of the fact that the Court of Appeal reached its conclusions on grounds which did not involve a final pronouncement on the validity of intermediate powers.

- f In the result, I conclude that I am not constrained by authority to strike down a power which a settlor, disposing of his own property under skilled advice, wishes to confer on his trustees.

- g Declaration accordingly.

Wilkes and others v Gee

RUSSELL, STAMP AND ROSKILL LJJ
2nd, 3rd, 4th MAY 1973

Common land – Registration – Disputed claims – Jurisdiction – Commons Commissioner – Residual jurisdiction of High Court – Circumstances in which residual jurisdiction exercisable – Application for registration not made bona fide.

The defendant applied under the Commons Registration Act 1965 for the registration of certain land, including land belonging to the plaintiffs, as common land. The land was provisionally registered as common land. The evidence adduced by the defendant in support of his claim that the land was common land was of the most tenuous nature. At the time of the application the plaintiffs were negotiating for the sale of the land to the local authority who wished to build a much needed school thereon. Until the question whether the land was common land had been determined the negotiations could not be completed. However, although Commons Commissioners had been appointed under the 1965 Act to hear objections, it would be many months before the plaintiffs' objection to the defendant's registration would be heard. The plaintiffs therefore brought proceedings against the defendant in the High Court and moved for an order that the defendant 'do forthwith procure or concur in the removal' of the land from the commons register.

Held – On the assumption that, when once the statutory machinery for the determination of disputes had been set up, the court retained a residual jurisdiction, it could only exercise that jurisdiction in the most exceptional case, and only where it had been clearly shown that in making the application and subsequently refusing to withdraw it the applicant had been acting mala fide. The urgent needs of a possible or would-be purchaser were quite irrelevant. Although the evidence adduced by the defendant, on the hearing of the motion, that the land was common land was tenuous that was not sufficient to establish that his application had been made mala fide. Accordingly the motion would be dismissed (see p 1216 f, p 1217 f and g, p 1218 b to d, p 1219 d and f to j and p 1220 g, post).

Decision of Plowman J [1973] 1 All ER 226 affirmed.

Interlocutory appeal

The plaintiffs, Michael Bruce Wilkes, Adrian Nicholas Wilkes, Colin Richard Burridge and Anthony John Burridge, appealed against the order of Plowman J¹ dated 21st November 1972 whereby he dismissed the plaintiffs' motion for an order that the defendant, Earnest Howard Valentine Gee, do forthwith procure or concur in the removal of the plaintiffs' land known as and situate at Sandford Pottery, Gorehill, Sandford, Wareham in the county of Dorset from the commons register kept by the Dorset County Council pursuant to the Commons Registration Act

RUSSELL LJ. This is an appeal from a decision of Plowman J¹ and it concerns the Commons Registration Act 1965. That is an Act which in broad terms provides a system for defining and ascertaining what lands are common land and what rights of common exist. The decision has to be made by a statutory tribunal consisting of persons appointed as Commons Commissioners, subject to appeal to the High Court on points of law.

Broadly speaking, under the Act any person can apply to the registration authority for the register of common lands (the authority here being the Dorset County Council) for the registration of any land within the area of their authority as common land in general terms or as subject to specific rights of common. That application has to be supported by a statutory declaration by the applicant in which he avers that he verily believes it to be common land within the definition extracted from the statute which is reproduced on the reverse of the statutory declaration form. Provided the application is made in due and proper form, the registration authority registers it in respect of the whole of the land subject to the application under a particular number (in this case CL309), and that is known as a provisional registration.

Provisional registration is not, it has been held², evidence of itself of the existence of any common rights or of the fact that the land when registered is common land. What follows under the machinery from a provisional registration is that, after notification to persons who appear to be concerned with the question whether it is common land or not, objections may be lodged against provisional registration: for example, by a person claiming to be the owner of any land within the provisional registration and in circumstances in which he wishes to contend, or contends, that it is not common land. When such an application is lodged, then the applicant for registration as common land is notified, and he is given an opportunity of withdrawing his application; and if he does withdraw the application, then the effect of that is, assuming his to be the only application in relation to the particular serial numbered land, that the registration has to be cancelled by the registration authority.

If the applicant for registration does not so withdraw, then in due course the registration authority will refer the dispute—that is, the dispute between the applicant for registration, who asserts it to be common land, and the objector, who asserts that it is not common land—to a Commons Commissioner for solution.

Now by statutory instrument³ under the Act cases arising under the Act are divided into what are referred to as 'first period cases' and 'second period cases', depending, broadly speaking, on when in time the application for registration or the objection (I forget exactly which) arose. All first period cases have some time since become referable by the registration authority to the Commons Commissioner. The second period cases, such as the one with which we are dealing now, have not yet become so referable by statutory instrument under the language of the relevant subsection of the statute, though enquiry at the appropriate sources shows that the present intention of the relevant government department is to issue a statutory instrument in May giving the reference date for second period cases as the end of July 1973. Some time, therefore, is bound to elapse after that date before the present dispute could be determined by the Commons Commissioner, because it is necessary for procedures such as advertisement and so forth to be followed. a

As appears from the report of the case below¹, the defendant applied for registration of a large area of land in the district of Wareham in Dorset as common land, and this substantial area was provisionally registered as common land. Included in the area were two parcels of land belonging to the plaintiffs. On the larger of those two parcels, the more easterly of them, there had been for many years an industrial use—I think from 1850 onwards—the use being for the most part connected with brick or pottery making. It is not so used at the moment. b

The plaintiffs objected to the registration in respect of those parcels of land, and though other applicants for registration of the area CL309, which includes these two parcels, have withdrawn—for example, the local parish council—the defendant has not withdrawn. There is some question whether another applicant has effectively withdrawn, but in the event I do not think I need concern myself with the details of that. c

Faced with the fact that some considerable time must elapse before this dispute can be determined by the Commons Commissioner, and seeking to follow certain precedents in the court, the plaintiffs issued a writ which was designed to compel the defendant to withdraw his registration application in respect of at least the plaintiffs' two parcels of land that I have mentioned, and in those proceedings the plaintiffs moved for an order on the defendant to do so. It is from the refusal by Plowman J¹ of such an order that the plaintiffs now appeal to this court. d

What the plaintiffs said, and say, is that they were well advanced in negotiation with the local authority (in fact, it so chanced also to be the same authority as the registration authority) to sell the larger of the two parcels or areas to that authority so that the authority could carry out its wish—and it is said to be an urgent wish—to build what is said to be a much needed school thereon. For this reason, the plaintiffs said that the determination was urgent and should not await the lapse of a good many more months, even from now onwards, before the dispute could be dealt with and adjudicated on by the Commons Commissioner. In that sense it is said that the matter is urgent. I would say at once that the urgent needs of a possible or would-be purchaser from the plaintiffs are to my mind quite irrelevant. If there be any relevant question of urgency, it relates in my view entirely to the desire of the plaintiffs to convert their land into money. They say, of course, that so long as the provisional registration remains they are unlikely to find a person wishing to build on this plot of land who will agree to buy it from them. Perhaps this might be said to be a particular example of a difficulty in the way of satisfying a would-be purchaser as to title—a difficulty which might of course exist in any case, quite apart from the Commons Registration Act 1965 and provisional registration thereunder—where people were asserting that in fact the vendor's land was common land, whether by shouting it in the market place or by writing to the local press. e

I should perhaps at this stage, to get them out of the way, mention two subsidiary points. The first is that as to the smaller of the plaintiffs' two areas, the more westerly one, there is no suggestion as a fact that a provisional registration is a stumbling block at the moment. There is no purchaser in view, and an order against the defendant now in respect of that area is not, I think, now sought. The other subsidiary point is that the defendant says that by some error on the part of the registration authority the provisional registration covers a part of the larger of the plaintiffs' two areas which was not included, or not intended to be included, in the defendant's application. The part is a wedge-shaped area which appears hatched on the exhibited plan and is labelled with the word 'error'. But that still leaves a substantial part of the plaintiffs' larger area which remains in dispute. So far as the wedge-shaped or hatched 'error' portion is concerned, I do not know, but I dare say in due course the defendant f a will seek to put it right, whatever the outcome of this case, and insofar as lies within his power, if appropriate, by a partial withdrawal in relation to that part.

We have had a good deal of discussion on whether there is any jurisdiction in the court to intervene in the way it is now suggested the court should intervene by, in effect, taking the matter out of the hands of the Commons Commissioner and deciding aye or nay whether the land said to be common land is common land.

b There have been cases in which as the result of intervention by the court the defendant, the applicant who procured the provisional registration as common land, has been ordered to take the steps necessary to procure the withdrawal of his application, and consequently the cancellation of the registration, under pain if he did not obey the order, it being in the nature of a mandatory injunction, of committal for contempt. Those cases had in fact asserted jurisdiction at times when no machinery for determination of disputes under the Act had been established, because no Commons Commissioner had been appointed.

c Insofar as there was any case after the appointment of the first Commons Commissioner on those lines, it does not appear to me that there was one in which the point of jurisdiction was contested. In this case of course the commissioners have been appointed: the first one was appointed, as I understand it, towards the end of 1971. So that the complete machinery envisaged by the Act now exists, and existed at the time when the writ was issued and when the motion came before Plowman J¹. There is quite plainly a difference between that situation and the situation when no such machinery existed.

The only factor which is pointed to by the plaintiffs in this case lies in the fact that the date for referring this dispute, and, indeed, all other second period disputes, for adjudication by the Commons Commissioners has not yet arrived. It does not lie within the power of the registration authority—and so far as one can see, will not lie within the power of the registration authority—to refer this dispute to the Commons Commissioners until after July 1973.

Whatever may have been the justification for asserting jurisdiction in the court in such matters as this when no machinery existed under the Act, I, for myself, much doubt whether there is jurisdiction now to do what is sought by the plaintiffs. The machinery is all there. The delays are involved because the Act and the government department entrusted with the working out of the statute considered it appropriate that there should be delay, and have provided in fact that second period cases shall not be dealt with by the Commons Commissioners until after a particular date. I, for my part, however, am prepared, as was Plowman J, to assume, without by any means deciding, that there is, at least as a technical matter, jurisdiction in a case such as this to make an order such as is sought by the plaintiffs. But in that case,

g I entirely agree with Plowman J that this case is not one in which the jurisdiction should be exercised. It seems to me that this jurisdiction, if it exists still at this stage in the operation of the Act can only be one which can be properly exercised in the most extraordinary case.

In the first place, I find there is nothing extraordinary or remarkable in the fact that the plaintiffs want to sell and find it difficult to turn the land into money until the Commons Commissioner has settled the dispute in their favour, if in their favour it be ultimately settled. There must, I should have thought, be many such cases. That is simply the result of the legislation—legislation which, looking at the other side of the coin, while it might be thought hampering to the plaintiffs in their design to sell their land for the time being, on the other hand, when the procedures are gone through that are envisaged by the Act, if the plaintiffs are right, will mean that their situation will be far more certain than it would ever have been without this particular legislation; because once the Commons Commissioner decides that the land is not, as the defendant suggests, common land, then the Act provides, apart from an appeal on the question of law, that that finally determines the matter.

So that whereas, on the one hand, some delay may be involved in the realisation of the property by persons in the position of the plaintiffs (and of course a delay would be amply justified if it is common land), nevertheless, on the other hand, in their favour, the Act will if they are right to some extent compensate them by making it abundantly plain that nobody can ever again raise the cry of 'common land' in respect of their property.

When I say that it seems to me, if the jurisdiction exists, at this stage it would only be in an extraordinary case, I, for my part, should have thought that it could only be in a case in which it was established beyond peradventure that the applicant for registration was at the time of the application, or has since become, other than bona fide in his suggestion that this is, or may turn out to be when the whole matter comes before the Commons Commissioner, common land. Tenuous though the evidence is of it being common land as the evidence now stands, as Plowman J¹ remarked, I do not see that it establishes such a total lack of bona fides on the part of the defendant as would justify the court in taking the matter out of the ordinary course and out of the hands of the Commons Commissioners, who in due course, or as the plaintiffs would think somewhat undue course, will determine the whole matter after full enquiry, and after the fact that they are going to enquire has been made public so that all who wish may come in and say their piece as to whether the land could be described as common land within any part of the definition of 'common land' in the Act.

What is said on behalf of the plaintiffs is that the evidence before the court at the moment is so clear that it cannot be common land that the court must really take it that the defendant is wholly lacking in bona fides in this matter. The industrial use I have mentioned is referred to. It is pointed out that according to the maps there is a large building, which is the pottery building, there—though let it be stated that it does not by any means occupy the whole of the land in question. It was suggested originally that it was entirely enclosed, but the evidence, about which there appears to be some dispute, suggests that certainly not to the north—and the rest of CL309 lies to the north—is there a visible boundary as between this and the rest of the property comprised in CL309. It may well be that the existence of the pottery building, with its foundations, is something which would preclude the continued existence (if any existed before) of any common rights, or of anything which could make that foundation site common land as defined. But, of course, there is more than the building. There is a statutory declaration exhibited to the affidavit of Mr Cake, solicitor for the plaintiffs, of a Mr Cecil Shaw. He says that he was a director of Sandford Pottery Co Ltd, who were the vendors to the plaintiffs, and that he had been since 3rd May 1922 well acquainted with three parcels of land which included the two portions in respect of which the plaintiffs object. He says:

'During such time [i.e. since 3rd May 1922] no person or persons have to my knowledge exercised or claimed any rights of common pasture way or sporting for such land or any part thereof and during the whole of such time until the Company sold the land in November 1968 [which was when it was sold to the plaintiffs] it has been in full free and undisturbed possession thereof for its own benefit and without any adverse claims . . . I depose of the above from my knowledge of the said land I being in almost daily attendance at the Company's Works which were situate on the part coloured Red and from having acted as a Director of the Company.'

Mr Cake said that he had inspected Sandford Pottery in 1972, and he described what he then found to be the condition of the boundaries. As I have said, evidence from the defendant suggests that the boundaries were not some few years before that inspection in the same condition, and more particularly to the northward, or, if I may loosely so describe it, the CL309 boundary of the larger of the two parcels.

a The defendant, of course, has by statutory declaration declared in support of his application that he verily believed the whole of the land in CL309, including these two parcels, to be common land. In his affidavit he describes his general occupation. He does not live very much in the district, though he has a house at Morden, Wareham. He says:

b 'I worked in different factories in south east Dorset before and after entering the travel business in 1957 and in particular in Sandford Pottery the area subject of the Plaintiff's application for about 3 months in 1949/50 where I first became aware of local contentions that the land there and adjacent was common . . .'

Then he points out that there had been provisional registration.

c It is said by counsel for the plaintiffs that if we were now sitting as, for example, Commons Commissioners, and this was all the evidence before us and all we knew, we would say that this is not to be defined as common land. In that he may well be right. I refer, in particular, to the arguments that have been addressed to us based on the statutory declaration and the argument based on the existence of the industrial use for these many years, and therefore the presumption of abandonment of any common rights that may have existed. The question remains, it seems to me, whether it is right to say, in view of the tenuousness of the actual evidence brought forward of this being common land, or if it had been common land the likelihood of it having been abandoned, that this shows that the defendant in his continued refusal to withdraw his application and the registration is not acting bona fide. I do not think it can rightly be said that, because on a motion of this kind this is all the evidence that is brought forward by the defendant, this is all the evidence he has got. There is no reason to justify a contention that a person is bound prematurely to produce the whole of the case which he hopes to adduce before the appropriate tribunal to decide this matter.

d Further than that, one does not know what evidence may emerge, not necessarily only from the defendant, but through the offices and efforts of the defendant, who has, as I should have mentioned, referred to a certain amount of research he has done, without deigning to give particulars. It seems to me that unless there is a very plain case of total lack of bona fides the court should not forestall any hearing by the Commons Commissioner in the due course of the working out of the machinery which has been established by Parliament. I am not prepared to say, more particularly in a case where the defendant has not been subject to any cross-examination, that he is acting in bad faith. I am not prepared to hold that the court should intervene in any case but a case of bad faith; nor am I prepared to hold that here a case of bad faith is established. Only in such a case would I think the court be justified in preventing (which is what is sought to be done) a hearing in the normal course by the Commons Commissioner of any dispute raised by provisional registration and an objection.

e In those circumstances, having dealt, I hope, in not too cavalier a fashion with the full arguments of counsel for the plaintiffs, I would dismiss the appeal.

f STAMP LJ. I entirely agree with all that Russell LJ has said, and I too would dismiss the appeal.

g ROSKILL LJ. I also entirely agree. I wish to add only a few words to Russell LJ's judgment. Section 5 (6) of the Commons Registration Act 1965 (I need not read the antecedent provisions either of that section or the previous sections) provides:

h 'Where such an objection is made, then, unless the objection is withdrawn or the registration cancelled before the end of such period as may be prescribed, the registration authority shall refer the matter to a Commons Commissioner.'

Pursuant to that and other provisions contained in the statute, the Commons Commissioners Regulations 1971¹ were duly promulgated. Regulation 6 of those regulations deals with the periods for settlement of disputes arising from objections to certain registrations. Regulation 6 (1) reads thus:

'For the purposes of section 5 (6) of the Act [that is the provision I have already read] . . . there is hereby prescribed, in relation to every objection to which this regulation applies, a period beginning with the date of the objection and ending with 17th December 1971.'

Regulation 6 (2) provides: 'This regulation applies to every objection to a first period registration', and then there are certain exceptions which are not material. Regulation 6 (3) provides:

In other words, Parliament has empowered the Minister making those regulations to prescribe how objections to first period registrations shall be dealt with and when they shall be referred to the Commons Commissioners. But the present registration to which objection is made was a second period registration, and the relevant delegated legislation, comparable with reg 6 of the 1971 regulations, has not yet been promulgated. In other words, the time has not yet arrived when this objection to this second period registration can properly be referred to the Commons Commissioners.

Counsel for the plaintiffs has founded on that fact as a ground for contending that there is a legislative gap which deprives his clients of the opportunity of having the grievance which they claim to have referred to the Commons Commissioners. With respect to that argument, I think it is misconceived. Parliament has enacted that objections to second period registrations shall not be referred until after a certain event has happened, namely, the promulgation of the relevant delegated legislation.

By this motion the plaintiffs are seeking, as it were, to bypass that statutory provision and to say that this court should treat that condition precedent as having been fulfilled, or alternatively to ignore its existence. In my judgment, that is wrong. Like Russell LJ, I feel much doubt whether there is any jurisdiction in this court to entertain this motion, but I am content to assume, as did Plowman J², that jurisdiction exists. In such circumstances, as Russell LJ has already said, jurisdiction if it exists should only be exercised in the type of case cited by him, as, for example, where there is plain mala fides on the part of the defendant. What is said is that the evidence supporting this registration is, to quote Plowman J's phrase², 'so tenuous' that the court should infer mala fides on the part of the defendant. For my part, I draw no such inference. It may be that in the event the evidence supporting the registration will prove to be tenuous. The present evidence is undoubtedly tenuous. But the time has not yet come when the defendant has to make good his registration, and until that time comes I see no reason why he should be made or expected to put forward the whole of his evidence. I, too, would dismiss the appeal.

Application for costs

On 5th October 1972 at Inner London Crown Court before his Honour Judge Figgis and a jury Michael Noel Arron was convicted of driving a motor vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in such quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was granted leave to appeal against conviction and legal aid for counsel. On 19th June 1973 the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, allowed his appeal and quashed the conviction. The appellant thereupon applied for an order that the costs of his appeal be paid out of central funds.

SCARMAN LJ. This successful appellant applies for an order for costs and he does so under s 24 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 which I now read:

'The Court of Appeal may, when they allow an appeal against conviction or against a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity or against a finding of disability, make an order for costs in favour of the appellant.'

Very recently, by Sch 3 to the Criminal Justice Act 1972, that section has been amended by the addition of a new subsection, which I now read:

'(3) An order for costs under this section in favour of any person is for the payment to him out of central funds of such sums as appear to the court to be reasonably sufficient to compensate him for any expenses properly incurred by him in the appeal or application (including any proceedings preliminary or incidental thereto) or in any court below.'

Very recently¹ a practice direction was issued by Lord Widgery CJ which stated:

'Although the award of costs must always remain a matter for the court's discretion, in the light of the circumstances of the particular case, it should be accepted as normal practice that when the court has power to award costs out of central funds it should do so in favour of a successful defendant, unless there are positive reasons for making a different order.'

In our view it would be an appropriate exercise of the court's discretion under s 24 (1) to grant to this appellant the costs of his appeal and accordingly we exercise our discretion under s 24 (1) and we direct, pursuant to s 24 (3), that these costs be paid to him out of central funds, the costs to be taxed by the registrar to this court. a

The only complication in the matter is that the appellant is legally aided. In the view of this court it is quite immaterial whether a successful appellant be legally aided or not. If in the relevant litigation the appellant is entitled to his costs, then an order will be made in the discretion of the court and following the practice direction, irrespective of the financing of his appeal whether it be private or public. There will be an order for the appellant's costs of the appeal, those costs to be taxed by the registrar. b

PRIVY COUNCIL

LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD HODSON, LORD PEARSON, LORD DIPLOCK AND LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE

22nd, 23rd, 24th, 25th JANUARY, 7th MARCH 1973 e

Fiduciary duty – Duty not to profit from position of trust – Society – Officer – Special arrangement displacing fiduciary duty – Incorporated society – Secretary undertaking to publish newspaper containing society's news – Society undertaking to guarantee purchase by members of 2,000 copies at 1s per copy for six months – Newspaper property of secretary – Secretary undertaking risk of financial loss – Whether secretary under duty to account to society for profits of newspaper – Whether special arrangement displacing fiduciary duty. f

In 1962 K joined a society which had been established to further the interest of the Dutch community in New Zealand. In 1963 he became its secretary. At that time the society began to publish a newsletter for the benefit of its members. K was the editor. The newsletter ceased publication in December 1966 because of financial difficulties. In 1966 K had acquired, out of his own resources, another Dutch newspaper which he later called the Windmill Post. On 5th January 1967 a meeting of members of the Dutch community was held and it was agreed to form a new society ('the society'). It was also agreed to produce a newspaper to be called the Windmill Post. It was agreed that the paper should be K's property; that the society should have the right to publish in it the society's news; that the society would guarantee for six months the purchase of the new paper at 1s per copy by 2,000 members; and that at the end of six months those terms, including the question whether the society would continue its support, would be renegotiated. The society was incorporated on 27th January as a non-profit making society. K was the unpaid secretary of the society and a member of the committee. The newspaper began publication in February. In June K and the society parted company and the society made plans to publish a rival newspaper under the same name. K obtained a perpetual injunction restraining the society from publishing, distributing or selling a newspaper under the name or style 'The Windmill Post' or any use of the words 'Windmill' or 'Post'. On appeal against that order it was contended by the society that K, by virtue of his position as secretary and a member of the committee of the society, was in a fiduciary position and had acquired the ownership of the newspaper while he held that position and by virtue of it; further that K could only be released from his g

- a accountability and allowed to retain the ownership of the paper for himself by an arrangement freely arrived at and after disclosure of all relevant matters.

Held – As an officer of an incorporated non-profit making society K had duties of trust and confidence placed in him; in particular he was subject to the strict obligation not to profit from his position of trust. The relationship of K and the society was such that there was at least the potentiality of a fiduciary relationship and if K, without any special arrangement, were to launch a newspaper there would at least be a case for saying that to claim or retain the benefit of it for himself would be a breach of fiduciary duty. However the circumstances, in particular the fact that K was to be the owner of the paper and was to undertake personally the risk of financial loss, in contrast to the society's limited commitments, were such as to establish a special arrangement between K and the society which displaced any potential fiduciary obligation on K to hold the newspaper on trust for the society. Since there was no evidence that any relevant matter relating to the establishment of the newspaper had not been disclosed to the society, the appeal would be dismissed (see p 1225 f and h, p 1226 c e f and h and p 1227 e f and h, post).

New Zealand Netherlands Society 'Oranje' Incorporated appealed against an order of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand (North P, Turner and Haslam JJ) dated 7th April 1971 dismissing an appeal against a judgment of Speight J dated 22nd December 1969 whereby he granted the respondents, Laurentius Cornelis Kuys and The Windmill Post Ltd, an injunction restraining the appellant from publicly distributing or selling a newspaper under the name and style of The Windmill Post or from using the words 'Windmill' or 'Post' or from using a large windmill device on the front page, and also dismissed the appellant's counterclaim for a similar injunction against the respondents. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Board.

- h B H Clark and T Lloyd (both of the New Zealand Bar) for the appellant.
R A Heron and J A Farmer (both of the New Zealand Bar) for the respondents.

LORD WILBERFORCE. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand affirming a judgment in the Supreme Court at Auckland of Speight J in favour of the present respondents. At the trial the learned judge granted the respondents, plaintiffs in the proceedings, a perpetual injunction restraining the appellant from publishing, distributing or selling a newspaper under the name or style of The Windmill Post or any use of the words 'Windmill' or 'Post' or from the use of the large windmill device on the front page. This was, in effect, relief against passing off, since the appellant was publishing a newspaper with the same title and device.

The litigation arises out of the existence and activities of the Dutch community of residents in New Zealand. To further their interests there was formed in 1949 the Netherlands Society 'Oranje' Incorporated (predecessor of and not to be confused with the appellant society). This was centred in Auckland, and may be referred to as the 'Auckland society'. The respondent Laurentius Cornelis Kuys joined this society in 1962: he became a member of its committee and in 1963 its secretary. In 1963 he started a group travel scheme whose purpose was to enable members to travel to the Netherlands at reduced rates. Also from 1963 the society published a newsletter for the benefit of its members called 'The Holland Bulletin', of which Kuys was the original editor. By the end of 1966 the Bulletin was in serious financial difficulties such that it could not continue in its then form and the last number in fact appeared in December 1966.

Kuys, previously to this, had desired to establish a national society of the Dutch in New Zealand and a proper newspaper on the lines of one published in Australia: this desire was shared by other members including Mr Dubois, the president of the society; but Kuys was told more than once that to do so was financially impossible. In 1966 Kuys acquired the only other Dutch newspaper, the 'New Zealand Hollander', for £100 which, as the judge held, came out of his own resources. He took on a partner, Mr I L Griffiths, not a member of the Auckland society, and some time in 1966 Kuys and Griffiths fixed on the name 'Windmill Post' as a trade name for the export and import of goods. Griffiths was aware of Kuys's desire to start a newspaper. Towards the end of 1966 contacts had been made by Kuys or Griffiths with printers and other newspapers with a view to calculating the cost of publication.

On 5th January 1967 there was a meeting of members of the Dutch community at the house of Mrs Hoeberigs, at which Kuys and Dubois were present. At the trial there was a radical disagreement between Dubois and others representing the appellant society on the one hand and Kuys and his witnesses on the other as to what was decided at this meeting. It is not disputed that it was agreed to form a new national society of the Dutch community in New Zealand—this became the appellant society which was incorporated on 27th January 1967. It is also not disputed that it was agreed to produce a newspaper to be called the Windmill Post. This was in fact produced first in February 1967 and later became the property of the second respondent, a company formed by Kuys and Griffiths. But there was a critical difference as to the terms on which the paper was to be administered.

The appellant's contentions, supported by the evidence of Dubois and one Renneberg, a committee member of the Auckland society and later treasurer of the appellant, were that it was agreed that the paper should be the property of the society, that Kuys should be the editor and publisher, that in the first place the society should not be under any financial responsibility for the paper but that the whole risk (of loss or profit) should be borne by Kuys who would look to sales and advertisements to make it pay; that for six months the society should guarantee purchases by its members of 2,000 copies at 1s per copy and finally that after six months the whole project should be reconsidered.

On his side Kuys's case was that, the former Bulletin being moribund, he, Kuys, should publish a new newspaper to be called 'The Windmill Post' which should be his property; that the society should have the right to publish in it the society's news; that the society would guarantee for six months the purchase of the new paper at 1s per copy by 2,000 members; finally that at the end of six months these terms, including the question whether the society would continue its support, would be renegotiated. (It will be noted that both versions refer to 'the society', in disregard of the fact that the appellant was not at the time in existence. It must be taken to mean the Auckland society and subsequently the appellant as its assignee. The expression 'the society' will be used hereafter in this sense.) The question which of these versions was correct was vital, and the entire case depends on it. Speight J heard evidence from persons present at the meeting. He also heard evidence from a persons present at a later meeting held in March 1967 at which the arrangements made in January were reported and again discussed. There was evidence, which the judge accepted, that at this March meeting complaints were made as to the society's prospective liability for newspaper losses, so that attention was focused on the exact terms of the January arrangement. One of the witnesses, whose evidence the judge found to be acceptable, made a tape recording at the time of the March discussions which he transcribed in typescript.

b On this evidence, the learned trial judge accepted the evidence of Kuys and his witnesses and rejected that of the appellant society. He held that the newspaper was the property initially of Kuys and later of his assignee, the second respondent. It being proved that the appellant, who had parted from Kuys in June 1967, was seeking to publish a rival newspaper under the same name and emblem, he granted an injunction in the terms already mentioned. On appeal, the Court of Appeal, after reviewing all the facts, endorsed the judge's findings and affirmed his judgment.

c Before their Lordships, counsel for the appellant conceded, necessarily, that no attack was possible on the concurrent findings of primary fact in the courts below. But it was submitted that the judgment of Speight J was defective in law. The appellant, as defendant to the proceedings, had pleaded, it was correctly said, that d Kuys, by virtue of his position as secretary and member of committee of the society, was in a fiduciary position. He had acquired the ownership of the newspaper while he held this position and by virtue of it. Admittedly it would be possible for the society to release him from accountability and to allow him to keep the ownership for himself: but this could only be done by an arrangement freely arrived at after full disclosure of all relevant matters. There had not, it was said, been that full disclosure. Moreover, it was contended that Kuys's conduct in a number of respects e was such as, in any event, should disentitle him to the equitable remedy of injunction.

Their Lordships are in agreement with these contentions insofar as they stress the necessity to give consideration to the nature of the relationship between Kuys and the society and to the question whether that relationship imposed on him, in relation to the particular transaction under investigation, duties of a fiduciary character. f The obligation not to profit from a position of trust, or, as it is sometimes relevant to put it, not to allow a conflict to arise between duty and interest, is one of strictness. The strength, and indeed the severity, of the rule has recently been emphasised by the House of Lords (*Boardman v Phipps*¹). It retains its vigour in all jurisdictions where the principles of equity are applied. Naturally it has different applications in different contexts. It applies, in principle, whether the case is one of a trust, express or implied, of partnership, of directorship of a limited company, of principal and agent, g or master and servant, but the precise scope of it must be moulded according to the nature of the relationship. As Lord Upjohn said in *Boardman v Phipps*²:

'Rules of equity have to be applied to such a great diversity of circumstances that they can be stated only in the most general terms and applied with particular attention to the exact circumstances of each case.'

h The present case is concerned with an officer of an incorporated, non-profit making society. Kuys was not paid for his services but he was a trusted employee; and he was ready to agree that he had duties of trust and confidence placed in him. On the other hand the scope of his responsibility and the dividing line between that and his own personal interests were loosely defined. It appears from the evidence that he j was able to run a small insurance business of his own: also it appears that he was permitted a personal interest in the group travel service which he managed for the society. A person in his position may be in a fiduciary position quoad a part of his activities and not quoad other parts: each transaction, or group of transactions, must be looked at. Their Lordships find support for this approach in the English Court of Appeal's judgments in *Tufton v Sperry*¹, particularly in that of Jenkins LJ, and in the High Court of Australia's judgment in *Birtchnell v Equity Trustees, Executors and Agency Co Ltd*². Dixon J said³:

'The subject matter over which the fiduciary obligations extend is determined by the character of the venture or undertaking for which the partnership exists, and this is to be ascertained, not merely from the express agreement of the parties . . . but also from the course of dealing actually pursued by the firm.'

This was said in the context of a partnership but the principle must be of general application.

It is, then, necessary to consider the relationship of Kuys and the society in regard to the publication of a newspaper. In their Lordships' opinion, there was at least the potentiality of a fiduciary relationship. The Auckland society had for several years published the newsheet called the Holland Bulletin—this was at the centre of its activity. Kuys was for some time the editor of the Bulletin and there is no doubt that he was so in his capacity as secretary. It was contemplated that in one form or another the new society, which became the appellant society, should be associated with a newspaper: its stated objects included taking over the publication of the Holland Bulletin. It was obvious and essential that any newspaper would largely depend for its viability on subscriptions by the society's members and that they would subscribe partly at least because it contained the society's news.

Another source of finance would be advertising, and there was evidence that the main likely clients, the airlines, were interested in supporting the society. Thus, in these circumstances, if Kuys had proceeded to launch a newspaper, without any special arrangement, there would be at the least a case for saying that to claim or retain the benefit of it for himself would be a breach of fiduciary duty.

On the other hand, what has already been said as to Kuys's position and responsibilities, left open the way for a special arrangement, and, equally, such an arrangement was, on the judge's findings, made. It was straightforward and, in the circumstances, reasonable. The Bulletin could not be carried on: to produce a newspaper obviously involved the risk of loss. The contract limited the society's commitment to the purchase of 2,000 copies at 1s each for six months. Kuys was to secure what advertising and other income he could to cover all outgoings and his own remuneration. He was not to come down on the society for any losses. As one witness said, he was not to cry on its shoulder. The newspaper was to be his for ill and for good.

There was much discussion at the trial as to what was to happen at the end of the period of six months. But the judge's finding (supported by the evidence) was that the reconsideration then to be given to the situation was limited to the amount, if any, of the society's support. That the ownership of the newspaper should revert to the society was certainly not agreed, and if it was not agreed, either, in terms, that the ownership should remain with Kuys, no other conclusion was possible from the terms which were agreed. There was therefore, in their Lordships' opinion, established a set of facts which would fully displace any potential fiduciary obligation on Kuys to hold the newspaper in trust for the society.

The learned judge did not in terms deal with the case in this way. He simply found the facts regarding the contract made in January 1967 and treated them as disposing of the case. Their Lordships would not disagree with the Court of Appeal, or indeed with the appellant's argument before the Board, that this somewhat telescoped approach may be open to criticism. But they also agree with the conclusions of the Court of Appeal, which were reached after a careful re-examination of the evidence, that the essential findings had been made. As was said by Turner J:

3 (1929) 42 CLR at 408

- a* '... I read the judgment, even though the words "fiduciary" or "dispensation" do not appear therein, as finding as a basic essential fact that the effect of the conversations of 5th January was to give Kuys a dispensation from the fiduciary duty which without that dispensation he might have owed.'

And North P said this:

- b* 'I agree that it might have been better if the learned judge had said in express terms that Mr Kuys had discharged the burden of showing that the fact that he was the secretary of the Auckland society and later of the national society did not in the circumstances require him to hold that he was trustee of the newspaper and its title for the society. Nevertheless, in result that is what I understand the learned judge really decided. I should add that on my own examination of the facts, I would undoubtedly have come to the same conclusion, for it is beyond my powers of credence to contemplate that Mr Kuys would have been willing to incur all the risks which everybody knows are attendant on commencing the publication of a newspaper and then be obliged to hand over the newspaper to the society at the end of six months if, as proved to be the case, he ceased to be secretary of the society.'

- d* On the main portion of this case their Lordships are in agreement with the Court of Appeal.

- The remaining points may be briefly dealt with. First, as to disclosure. Their Lordships entirely accept, as a matter of law, that if an arrangement is to stand, whereby a particular transaction, which would otherwise come within a person's fiduciary duty, is to be exempted from it, there must be full and frank disclosure of all material facts. But the appellant was quite unable to point to any matter relevant to the establishment of the newspaper or which, had it been disclosed, could have affected the society's decision that, on the facts found, had not been disclosed by Kuys. It is apparent from the judgments that even if the argument as to non-disclosure was advanced in the courts below it was not accepted. There are no grounds on which it can be accepted in this appeal.

- f* Secondly, as to the granting of an equitable remedy to the respondents. Their Lordships again endorse the validity of the maxim that seekers of equity must come with clean hands. A number of authorities, in various fields, were properly cited. But the appellant's argument, in this part of the case, fails on the facts. A large number of facts were ventilated at the trial, in an attempt to show that Kuys had been guilty of irregularities of various kinds in his management of the society's affairs. Some of these are, their Lordships understand, the subject of further litigation. Their Lordships do not find it appropriate to do more than endorse the opinions of the courts below that nothing, relevant to the transaction in question, of sufficient gravity, was established to entitle their Lordships to take a different view, on what is a matter of discretion, from the courts below. The one matter which was proved was the unjustified use in the respondents' newspaper of an emblem belonging to the society (a small windmill), but this was expressly excluded from the relief granted. In their Lordships' opinion the injunction granted should be upheld.

- h* Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

- j* Appeal dismissed.

SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS, MR J H ARKELL AND MR H BRIGGS

16th MAY 1973

Industrial relations – Unfair dismissal – Dismissal in connection with strike or other industrial action – Employee taking part in strike on date of dismissal – Date of dismissal – Time of dismissal – Dismissal on date of termination of strike – Dismissal after termination of strike – Whether employee taking part in strike ‘on the date of dismissal’ – Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 26 (1).

On 7th August 1972 the employees went on strike. They then consulted their union area organiser who advised them to return to work. The employees accepted that advice and on 8th August the employer was informed that the employees were willing to return to work. After receiving that information, and on the same day, the employer dismissed the employees. On a complaint of unfair dismissal by two employees, an industrial tribunal held that, by virtue of s 26 (1)^a of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, they were precluded from finding that the employees' dismissal was unfair since ‘on the date of dismissal’ the employees were taking part in a strike. The employees appealed.

Held – (i) Once an employer had been informed that a strike was over, he no longer required the protection afforded by s 26 of the 1971 Act. Accordingly, in s 26 (1) of the 1971 Act, the word ‘date’ should be construed as meaning ‘at the time’ so that if on any given date an employer was told that a strike was over, he was not free during the rest of that calendar day to dismiss those who had taken part in the strike, without the risk of it being held that he had acted unfairly in so doing (see p 1231 j to p 1232 a, post); dicta of Harman and Salmon LJ in Trow v Ind Coope (West Midlands) Ltd [1967] 2 All ER at 908, 909 applied.

(ii) Accordingly, the case would be referred back to the tribunal with a direction that s 26 of the 1971 Act was not applicable because the employees' dismissal had taken place after the employer had been notified that the strike was terminated (see p 1232 c, post).

This was an appeal by William Heath and Reginald Hammersley against the decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman R E Chapman Esq) sitting in Shrewsbury, dated 2nd February 1973, that the appellants' complaint of unfair dismissal against the respondents, J F Longman (Meat Salesmen) Ltd, be dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

SIR HUGH GRIFFITHS delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a decision of an industrial tribunal sitting at Shrewsbury, dismissing, with some reluctance, the appellants' claims for compensation on the ground of c unfair dismissal.

The appellants had both been employed for a number of years in an abattoir operated by the respondents. The first appellant had been in their employment for ten years, the second appellant for six years. It came to the knowledge of the two appellants that other abattoirs in the district paid overtime rate for work on Saturdays.

d The appellants were not paid overtime for work on Saturdays and this was a source of grievance to them. Their union representative took up the matter on their behalf and wrote a number of letters to the respondents' managing director, Mr Longman, seeking an interview in order to discuss the matter and to see if any settlement could be achieved. Mr Longman was not prepared to treat with the union on this matter and ignored the requests.e Eventually, sometime towards the end of July 1972, a Mr Hankey, employed as a foreman by the respondents, had a meeting with Mr Longman in which he presented the men's point of view. Precisely what was said at that meeting does not appear clearly from the findings of the tribunal, but there is no doubt that the meeting took place to discuss whether or not the men should be paid overtime on Saturday. This much is clear—Mr Longman made it abundantly plain that he was not prepared to pay overtime and that the men could stop working when they had done their ordinary week's work, if they wished.*f As a result of that meeting the two appellants did not come in to work on the next two Saturdays. This upset Mr Longman, and on Monday, 7th August, he came into the rest room where the men were assembled and told them that if they did not work on the following Saturday they would be dismissed. The two appellants, and another man named Wilbraham, walked out and did not return to work that day, or the following day, or on the Wednesday. The tribunal found that the three men had in fact gone on strike in order to put pressure on Mr Longman to pay overtime. Such a finding was abundantly supported by the evidence and in particular the evidence of Mr Smallwood, the union area organiser (who was called to give evidence on behalf of the appellants), who told the tribunal that when the men had come to see him on the Tuesday he had asked them why they had stopped work and they told him, 'to put pressure on'.*h 'Strike' is defined in the Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 167 (1), in the following terms:*i '... "strike" means a concerted stoppage of work by a group of workers in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute, whether they are parties to the dispute or not, whether (in the case of all or any of those workers) the stoppage is or is not in breach of their terms and conditions of employment, and whether it is carried out during, or on the termination of, their employment'.

Counsel for the appellants has sought to persuade us that these men were not on strike. The first point he takes is that the tribunal ought not to have concluded that this was a concerted stoppage, because in fact it was a Mr Hattersley who walked first out of the meeting and was then followed by the others. In the face of the evidence of the union representative, and taking into account all the other evidence, it is quite clear that the tribunal was entitled to regard this as a concerted stoppage of work by these three men and, furthermore, that its manifest purpose was to further their industrial dispute in regard to overtime payment. a

On the Tuesday the men went to see Mr Smallwood and he gave them good advice. They were advised that the action which they were taking was not the sensible course; that they should leave the matter in the hands of their union, and that they should return to work. The men decided to accept this advice and so they deputed one of their number—in fact Mr Wilbraham—to telephone to Mr Longman on the Wednesday and indicate that the men wanted to come back to work. The tribunal's findings are in the following terms: b

'... the following Tuesday ... they went to see Mr Smallwood, and told him what had happened. He told them very properly, very wisely, that they were adopting the wrong course of action, and that they should try to get back to work. They deputed one of their number Mr Wilbraham to make a telephone call to the respondents offering to go back to work. This Mr Wilbraham did on the Wednesday and on the Wednesday we are satisfied that Mr Wilbraham was told that all three were finished. We think that in fact they were dismissed on Wednesday 9th August when, through Mr Wilbraham, they were told that they were finished.' c

It is quite clear from those findings that the tribunal concluded that the dismissal was communicated to Mr Wilbraham after he had told Mr Longman that the men wanted to come back to work and when, so far as they were concerned, their strike action was over. Nevertheless the members of the tribunal concluded that by virtue of the terms of s 26 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 they were constrained to find that the dismissal was not unfair, whatever they might think about the real merits of the case. Section 26 of the 1971 Act provides: d

'(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect in relation to an employee who claims that he has been unfairly dismissed by his employer, where on the date of dismissal he was taking part in a strike or in any irregular industrial action short of a strike. e

'(2) If the reason or principal reason for the dismissal was that the claimant took part in the strike or other industrial action, the dismissal shall not be regarded as unfair unless it is shown—(a) that one or more employees of the same employer (in this section referred to as "the original employer"), who also took part in that action, were not dismissed for taking part in it, or (b) that one or more such employees, who were dismissed for taking part in it, were offered re-engagement on the termination of the industrial action and that the claimant was not offered such re-engagement, and that the reason (or, if more than one, the principal reason) for which the claimant was selected for dismissal, or not offered re-engagement, was his having taken action to which the next following subsection applies. f

'(3) This subsection applies to any action on the part of the claimant which consisted of exercising, or indicating his intention to exercise, any of the rights conferred on him by section 5 (1) of this Act ... g

It appears to this court that the manifest overall purpose of s 26 is to give a measure of protection to an employer if his business is faced with ruin by a strike. It enables him in those circumstances, if he cannot carry on the business without a labour force, to dismiss the labour force on strike; to take on another labour force without the stigma of its being an unfair dismissal. h

That being the overall purpose, it would appear to be manifestly wrong, when an employer has been told that strike action has been called off, that he should nevertheless still be free to dismiss those who took part in the strike, without any risk of i a finding that he was acting unfairly. This is a result which the members of this court would be anxious to avoid, unless the language of the section drove them to it.

However, the submission of the respondents is that the language of s 26 (1) does lead to the conclusion that these men were dismissed on a date when they were taking part in a strike. That they were dismissed because they took part in a strike appears to be clear, and the question is: were they at the date of the dismissal, within the meaning of s 26 (1), taking part in the strike? If 'date' in s 26 (1) is to be construed as 'calendar day', then clearly they were dismissed when on the date of dismissal they were taking part in a strike, because until such time as the employer was informed that the men were no longer taking part in any strike action, which did not take place until about midday on Wednesday, they must be considered as still on strike. So they were on strike for part of Wednesday. We cannot accept the submission of counsel for the appellants that some private agreement between those on strike which is not communicated to an employer suffices to terminate a strike. But once the men had telephoned and told the employer that they no longer wished to withdraw their labour, and wanted to come back to work, they had in our view clearly ceased to be on strike. They made no conditions, and in the context of this case it must have been apparent that they were accepting the advice of the union and were ceasing their own unofficial action. It is true that the men were not back at work, but the employer knew he was no longer under strike pressure and the men's absence had ceased to be in furtherance of an industrial dispute. The employer knew that as from the following morning he would have his work force back. Can it then be that he should then be free to dismiss them, without running the risk of its being considered unfair?

As a general rule it is an established principle of construction that where a statute refers to a day it should be construed as the whole day and not a fraction of the day. But there are exceptions. In a recent decision of the Court of Appeal, *Trow v Ind Coope (West Midlands) Ltd*¹, Harman LJ, in giving judgment, drew attention to such an exception. He said²:

"The law does not as a rule take account of fractions of the day unless there is some necessity for it, as for instance in the dog licence case (*Campbell v. Strangeways*³), and there is no such necessity here. That case turned on the fact that the dog licence was taken out during the day in question. It was therefore clear that during so much of that day as preceded the issue of the licence, the dog was not licensed. During the rest of the day the dog was licensed. It was therefore necessary to split the day into the period before and the period after the issue of the licence. To construe it otherwise would be to fly in the face of the facts because it was certainly true that during part of the day the dog was unlicensed and during the subsequent part of the day it was licensed. Accordingly, "date" in that case must mean "time", but in the absence of any such necessity, "date" and "time" are in contradistinction one from the other."

'Ordinarily the law takes no account of fractions of a day unless there is some special reason for doing so, as there was, e.g., in *Campbell v. Strangeways*³.'

In this case there is a special reason for doing so. Once the employer is informed that the strike is over, he no longer requires the protection afforded by s 26. Accordingly, the word 'date' in s 26 (1) should be construed as 'at the time', so that if, on any given date, an employer has been told that the strike is over, he is not free during the rest of that calendar day to dismiss the men who took part in it, without running the risk that an industrial tribunal will hold that he acted unfairly. It follows that the tribunal was not in fact constrained, as it felt, to apply the provisions of s 26 to this case and to hold that the dismissal was, by definition, fair. The tribunal expressed its conclusion as follows:

‘We are therefore driven back to the express provisions of s 26 which says that a strike in circumstances such as these shall not be regarded as unfair. Therefore, on that point of law, we find ourselves compelled to dismiss each of these applications, holding that, by virtue of s 26 the dismissal was not unfair . . . Had we been able to come to a conclusion on the merits of this case, as opposed to a strict legal finding, we might very well have come to a very different conclusion.’

This case will therefore be referred back to the tribunal, with an indication that s 26 was not applicable, because the dismissal, on their findings of fact, came after the employers were notified of the termination of the strike.

Before leaving the case we should deal with a further argument which was advanced by counsel for the appellants, the burden of which was that these men were dismissed, not on 9th August by the action of the employer, but on 7th August when, as he submits, the employer wrongly repudiated their contracts. This submission is based on what counsel for the appellants said the tribunal should have held happened at a meeting between the employer and the foreman, to which we have already referred, which took place about a fortnight before 7th August. Counsel for the appellants submits that the tribunal should have concluded that at that meeting there was a consensual variation of the men’s terms of employment, in that they were no longer required as a term of their contracts to work on Saturdays. Counsel for the appellants argues that as there had been that consensual variation, when the employer told the men on Monday that if they did not work next Saturday they would be dismissed, it was a repudiatory breach of their contracts, which they were entitled to regard as dismissal. We cannot accept that the tribunal was bound to come to this conclusion. Indeed, we think that the weight of the evidence points clearly against it. There was a running dispute between the employer and the employees whether or not the employees had to work Saturday overtime. It appears to us to be extremely improbable that Mr Longman would have made the concession for which counsel for the appellants contends. The short and sufficient answer is that the tribunal did not find that as a fact. The tribunal is charged with finding the facts, and, unless it can be shown that the evidence was so much one way that no reasonable tribunal could have disregarded it, it is not possible to interfere with its finding of fact. On this vital question the tribunal’s finding of fact reads as follows:

‘We are satisfied on the balance of the evidence before us that about a fortnight or so before 7th August there was a meeting between someone acting on behalf of the men, their foreman Mr Hankey and Mr Longman, in which Mr Longman said that he was not going to pay any overtime and if the men did not want to work overtime they need not do it and on the following two Saturdays each of these two applicants and Mr Wilbraham did not turn up for work.’

That is very far short of the finding of fact which counsel for the appellants has to establish before he can succeed on this alternative argument, which must fail.

STEPHENSON LJ, THESIGER AND MACKENNA JJ

- b Trade description – False or misleading statement – Provision of services – Promise in regard to future – Prediction as to future facts – Statements incapable of being true or false at time made – Holiday brochure – Brochure issued in winter for following summer season – Brochure stating hotel had swimming pool – Swimming pool being built for summer season – Swimming pool not in fact completed by summer – Need to prove that statement meant hotel had swimming pool at time brochure issued – Trade Descriptions Act 1968, s 14 (1).

- c Trade description – Document – Interpretation – False trade description or statement – Statement in document alleged to be false – Meaning of statement – Whether interpretation of document matter for judge or jury.

- d In 1969 the appellants, a firm of travel agents, published a travel brochure for 1970 relating to an hotel in Spain. The hotel was stated in the brochure to be new and very comfortable, with a swimming pool and modern restaurant. The food was stated to be good, with English dishes also available as well as special meals for children. Push chairs were also said to be for hire. The season began on 7th March 1970 and ended on 6th October. The owners of the hotel planned to improve it during the winter of 1969-1970. The upper floors of the hotel were to be reconstructed and a swimming pool built on the roof. When the hotel closed for the 1969-1970 winter season the builders went to work, but not as efficiently or quickly as had been hoped. Meanwhile, on 7th January 1970, B read a copy of the appellants' brochure and bought tickets for himself and his family from the appellants for a holiday at the hotel beginning on 27th May. When B got there he found that the swimming pool could not be filled with water because it had not been properly completed, push chairs were not available at the hotel, but could be hired from a nearby shop, and there were no special dishes for children. The appellants were charged on three counts of an indictment with recklessly making false statements in their brochure, contrary to s 14 (1) (b)^a of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, namely, that the hotel had a swimming pool (count 1), that there were push chairs for hire at the hotel (count 2) and that the hotel provided special dishes for children (count 6).
- e The jury were directed that it was for them to decide whether the services and facilities at the hotel were represented in the brochure as existing on 7th January (when B read the brochure), on 7th March (the earliest date for taking guests) or on 27th May (when B arrived); that having chosen the date, they should then consider whether any statement in the brochure was true at that date and if not, and they thought that the statement had been made recklessly, they should convict the appellants. The appellants were convicted on counts 1, 2 and 6 and appealed.

- h Held – (i) Section 14 of the 1968 Act related to statements of fact which were either true or false at the time when they were made. A prediction or promise about the future could not be said to have been true or false at the time when it was made. Accordingly s 14 did not deal with forecasts or promises unless they contained by implication a statement of present fact (see p 1236 g to j and p 1239 g and h, post).

- i (ii) It followed therefore that it was incumbent on the judge to direct the jury that, in the case of the swimming pool, if they construed the words in the brochure as relating to the future, they should acquit the appellants on count 1. Since he had failed to do so, and since it was not disputed that the statements which were the subject of counts 2 and 6 related to the future, the convictions should be quashed and the appeal allowed (see p 1241 d and e, post). a

Appeal

On 9th October 1972 in the Crown Court at Woodford before his Honour Judge Mason QC and a jury the appellants, Sunair Holidays Ltd, were convicted on three counts (counts 1, 2 and 6) of an indictment alleging that they had recklessly made false statements as to the provision of services etc, contrary to s 14 (1) (i), (ii) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. The appellants were fined £4,000 on count 1, and £500 each on counts 2 and 6. An order to pay £150 towards the Crown's costs was also made against the appellants. The appellants appealed against both conviction and sentence. The main ground of appeal against conviction was that the judge had failed to direct the jury that the statements which were the subject of the counts constituted warranties and representations as to the future and not statements which fell within the meaning of s 14 of the 1968 Act. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. e

Cur adv vult g

18th May. MACKENNA J read the following judgment of the court at the invitation of Stephenson LJ. Sunair Holidays Ltd, the appellants in this case, are a company selling package tours abroad. In the autumn of 1969 they published a brochure, 'Sunair Summer 1970' containing particulars of hotels in Spain, Italy and other countries in which they offered accommodation for the summer season of 1970. One of these was the Hotel Cadi at Calella on the east coast of Spain. Mr Bateman got a copy of Sunair's brochure from a travel agency in Romford some time after Christmas 1969, read it, chose the Hotel Cadi, and on 7th January 1970 bought tickets from Sunair for a Whitsun holiday at that hotel for himself and his family beginning on 27th May 1970. When they got to Calella in May they were dissatisfied with the hotel, and on their return to England Mr Bateman complained to the authorities who started criminal proceedings against Sunair. The proceedings were by way of an indictment containing six counts. Each count charged Sunair with making a false statement about the Hotel Cadi in the 1970 brochure contrary to s 14 (1) (b) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. In each case the statement was said to have been made on 7th January 1970, the date when Mr Bateman bought the tickets. h a We shall quote the particulars of the six allegedly false statements, using in each case the words of the indictment:

Count 1 '... that the Hotel Cadi, Calella, had a swimming pool, whereas there was no swimming pool at the said hotel.'

Count 2. '... that there were push chairs for hire at the Hotel Cadi, Calella, whereas no push chairs were available.'

b Count 3. '... that the Hotel Cadi, Calella, had its own night club, whereas there was no such night club at the said Hotel.'

Count 4. '... that cots were available at the Hotel Cadi, Calella, whereas no cots were available.'

Count 5. '... that there was dancing every night in the discotheque of the Hotel Cadi, Calella, whereas there was no discotheque at the said Hotel.'

c Count 6. '... that the Hotel Cadi, Calella, provided good food with English dishes available as well as special meals for children, whereas no English dishes or special meals for children were available.'

d The case was tried at the Woodford Crown Court in October 1972 before his Honour Judge Mason QC and a jury. The judge held that there was no case for Sunair to answer on count 4, that relating to the cots. He left the other five to the jury, who convicted on counts 1, 2 and 6, those relating to the swimming pool, the push chairs and the food, and acquitted on counts 3 and 5, those relating to the night club and the discotheque. Sunair appeal against their convictions and against the fines imposed on them by the judge.

To explain the points of law raised by the appeal it is necessary to quote the relevant parts of s 14 of the 1968 Act:

e '(1) It shall be an offence for any person in the course of any trade or business—
(i) the provision in the course of any trade or business of any services, accommodation or facilities; (ii) the nature of any services, accommodation or facilities provided in the course of any trade or business; (iii) the time at which, manner in which or persons by whom any services, accommodation or facilities are so provided; (iv) the examination, approval or evaluation by any person of any services, accommodation or facilities so provided; or (v) the location or amenities of any accommodation so provided.'

g Section 14 (2) (b) provides that a statement made regardless of whether it is true or false shall be deemed to be made recklessly, whether or not the person making it had reasons for believing that it might be false, while s 14 (4) provides that 'false' means false to a material degree.

h The two questions raised by this appeal can now be stated: (1) whether s 14, as the appellants now contend, is limited to representations of facts, past or present, or whether it includes assurances about the future, and, if the appellants' contention is right; (2) whether the jury's verdict on counts 1, 2 and 6, or any of them, can be upheld. Before we consider these two questions we shall quote those parts of the brochure which relate to the Hotel Cadi, and state a few of the facts about the hotel.

i 'Hotel Cadi, Calella. A new, very comfortable hotel in the centre of Calella and only about 20 yards from the beach. Luxurious lounge, with local decor, looks out on the sea. Well-stocked bar. Swimming pool. Modern restaurant: the food is good, with English dishes also available—as well as special meals for children. The friendly, informal Hotel Cadi also has its own night club; there is dancing every night in the discotheque. Lift to all floors. All bedrooms have a private w.c. and bath, and terrace. Cots also available. Push chairs for hire. Laundry service.'

The words 'swimming pool' were underlined in red. On the same page of the brochure particulars were given of the prices, including air travel, of a holiday at this hotel during a season beginning on 7th March and ending on 6th October, lower prices at the beginning and end of the season and higher in the middle. a

The hotel had been open during the summer of 1969, though apparently it had not been used that year by the appellants. It then had a room used as a discotheque and a night club, but no swimming pool. The owners of the hotel planned to improve it during the winter of 1969-1970. The upper floors at the rear of the hotel were to be rebuilt and a swimming pool was to be constructed on the roof. The room used for the discotheque and night club was to be enlarged. The hotel closed down for the winter and did not re-open until April or May 1970. In the meantime the builders went to work, but not as quickly or as efficiently as had been hoped. When the Batemans were at the hotel, the principal meals consisted of soup, chops, steaks or chicken, always served with chips, and ice-cream and mousses and the like for a pudding. The main dish is said to have been cooked in the Spanish style, presumably in oil. Children could have their meals an hour earlier than the adults, but there were no special dishes provided for them. By 27th May, the date when the Batemans arrived, the swimming pool had been built, but because of cracks or leaks it could not be filled with water. The discovery of these cracks and leaks and making them good took time, and this work was still being done while the Batemans were at the hotel. The larger room for the discotheque and the night club had not been finished, though the artistes who were to perform at the night club were at the hotel. Push chairs were not available at the hotel itself, though they could be hired from a shop in a neighbouring street. b

The appellants had made their contract with the owners of the hotel in April 1969. Under this the owners were to reserve accommodation for 130 of the appellants' customers at prices payable by the appellants and fixed by the contract. The appellants knew of the owners' intention to build a swimming pool. Because of the delay in the completion of the building work the appellants did not send any of their customers to the hotel until 27th May when the Batemans and others arrived. c

So much for the facts. We come now to the construction of s 14. The section deals with 'statements' of which it can be said that they were, at the time when they were made, 'false'. That may be the case with a statement of fact, whether past or present. A statement that a fact exists now, or that it existed in the past, is either true or false at the time when the statement is made. But that is not the case with a promise or a prediction about the future. A prediction may come true or it may not. A promise to do something in the future may be kept or it may be broken. But neither the prediction nor the promise can be said to have been true or false at the time when it was made. We conclude that s 14 does not deal with forecasts or promises as such. We put in the qualifying words 'as such' for this reason. A promise or forecast may contain by implication a statement of present fact. The person who makes the promise may be implying that his present intention is to keep it or that he has at present the power to perform it. The person who makes the forecast may be implying that he now believes that his prediction will come true or that he has the means of bringing it to pass. Such implied statements of present intention, means or belief, when they are made, may well be within s 14 and therefore punishable if they were false and were made knowingly or recklessly. But if they are punishable, the offence is not the breaking of a promise or the failure to make a prediction come true. It is the making of a false statement of an existing fact, somebody's present state of mind or present means. d

What we have said about s 14 agrees with the law of deceit, whether civil or criminal. In a civil action of deceit the plaintiff must prove that there was a false representation of fact as distinct from the failure to fulfil a promise: see Salmond on Tort¹. So it was with the old criminal law of false pretences: see Archbold's e a Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice¹. So it is with the new s 15 (4) of the Theft Act. And so it is with s 14.

This section has been considered by the Divisional Court in several cases, of which we shall cite three. The first is *Sunair Holidays Ltd v Dodd*². In that case the present appellants had made a statement in their 1969 holiday brochure about the facilities they offered at a hotel in Majorca, 'all twinbedded rooms with private bath, shower, w.c. and terrace'. The hotel had some rooms with terraces and some without.

b Before issuing the brochure the appellants had made a contract with the hotel providing that their clients should be given rooms with terraces. A Mr Welling got the brochure from a travel agency, read it, and made a booking with the appellants for a holiday at this hotel for himself and his wife. When they got to Majorca the hotel management gave them a room without a terrace. The appellants were charged with having on 13th January 1969 recklessly made a false statement about the 'amenities of accommodation' provided at the hotel for Mr and Mrs Welling, 'namely, that such amenities did not accord with the description given in its 1969 holiday brochure'. It is not clear from the report what was the point of the date chosen by the prosecution, 13th January, whether it was the date when the brochure was issued to the travel agency, or when it was given by the agency to Mr Welling, or when he made the booking. The justices convicted and the Divisional Court set aside the conviction for these reasons given in the judgment of Lord Parker CJ³:

'It seems to me that the brochure was intended to convey and does convey to the prospective holidaymaker, that the twin-bedded rooms that we can offer you at this hotel have those amenities. Looked at in that way, that statement when it was made was perfectly true. This was not the typical case of a brochure advertising accommodation which did not exist, having a swimming bath that was not constructed, or of hotel accommodation where a hotel was not opened. At the time when the statement was made it was perfectly accurate that the accommodation that they were offering existed. Not only did it exist, but the appellants had a contract with the hotel—I need not go into it—whereby the only twin-bedded rooms which they kept available for the appellants, and were offering to the appellants' clients, were rooms with these amenities, including a terrace. Accordingly, when [the statement] was made, it was in my judgment completely accurate. Counsel for the respondent has rather faintly suggested that really this statement is a continuing statement, and that it existed when these couples arrived at the hotel. For my part I am quite unable to accept that. This is a statement made on 13th January or at some later date after the brochure had been shown to them, and they had accepted the offer contained in it, and nothing that happened after that can affect the matter one way or the other whether that statement was false and made recklessly.'

g Lord Parker CJ's refusal to treat the words about the hotel as a continuing statement, and in that way as one relating to the future, on the ground that its truth must be judged as at the date when it was made, gives some support to our reading of s 14.

h The second case is *Bambury v Hounslow London Borough Council*⁴. Bambury was the director of a company selling motor cars. A customer saw a Ford Cortina at the company's premises on which the word 'guaranteed' appeared. He negotiated for the purchase of the car with Bambury, who told him that the word 'guaranteed' meant that if anything went wrong with the car during the next three months the company would put it right, and that this guarantee would be recorded in a book.

4 [1971] RTR 1

The customer bought the car, receiving an invoice which contained a printed condition excluding the company's liability for faults. The car developed several faults, including one in the clutch. The company made good some of them, but pretended that there was nothing wrong with the clutch which eventually was repaired by another garage at a cost to the customer of £17. Bambury was charged with having recklessly made a statement which was false—

'as to the provision in the course of trade or business of a facility, namely, a guarantee to effect repairs to the car for three months from the date of purchase.'

'that the defendant's statement as to provision of the guarantee was false and made recklessly by him either well knowing that it would not be or without caring whether or not it would be honoured.'

The conviction was upheld for the following reasons given by Lord Parker CJ¹.

'In my judgment the justices here came to a conclusion to which they were fully entitled to come. It is quite clear that by the words used to Mr Winslade the defendant was stating that his employers, the company of which he was a director, were assuming contractual obligations to repair the vehicle at any time within three months of the purchase . . . Two very minor matters were put right, but when a more substantial matter, namely, in regard to the clutch involving some £17 was involved, they did not put it right, despite the fact that a repair was necessary, but as the case finds, pretended that the fault did not exist. The fact that the contractual obligations were not complied with is consistent with one or other of two matters: one, a failure to perform their contractual obligations which they had entered into; or secondly, the fact that there never was an entering into of any contractual obligations at all. The justices, having regard no doubt to the finding that the company had not merely disputed that a repair was necessary, but knowing there was a repair needed, pretended it was not, found that the original statement that they were entering into contractual obligations was a false one. They might have come to a different conclusion, but in my judgment there was clearly evidence . . . that the original statement was false.'

Lord Parker CJ was distinguishing between a statement by Bambury that his company were undertaking an obligation to repair the car, which would be true or false at the time when the statement was made, and the undertaking itself, if one were given. Bambury would be liable under s 14 if the first alternative was the right one, and if the statement was untrue. That would be because he had made a false statement about an existing fact, namely his company's undertaking of an obligation. But he would not be liable on the second alternative, even if the company thereafter failed to perform the undertaking.

*Beckett v Cohen*² is the third case. There a builder had promised that he would build a garage within ten days and that it would be similar to an existing garage. He did not finish the garage in time, and the one he built was in some respects different from the existing garage. In respect of his failure to complete in time, he was charged with having made a statement, 'which was false as to the time at which a service, namely the building of a garage, would be provided'. In respect of the differences between the two garages, he was charged with having made a statement which was 'false as to the manner in which such a service would be provided'. The justices upheld the builder's submission that s 14 (1)— a 'only covered false statements as to services which had already been provided or were currently being provided, whereas the informations referred to a service which "would be provided" and therefore fell outside the scope of s 14 (1) of the Act'.

b '... the argument for the respondent which the justices adopted, and which to my mind answers the whole case for the appellant, is that s 14 (1), under which the offence is charged, has no application to statements which amount to a promise in regard to the future, and which therefore at the time when they are made cannot have the character of being either true or false. [After quoting the section, he went on:] This section matches earlier provisions in the Act
c dealing with the sale of goods. The purpose of the earlier sections is to prevent persons when selling goods from attaching a false description to the goods, and in the same way s 14 is concerned as I see it, when services are performed under a contract, to make it an offence if the person providing the services recklessly makes a false statement as to what he has done. The section specifically refers to the reckless making of a statement which is false. That means d that if at the end of the contract a person giving the service recklessly makes a false statement as to what he has done, the matter may well fall within s 14, but if before the contract has been worked out, the person who provides the service makes a promise as to what he will do, and that promise does not relate to an existing fact, nobody can say at the date when that statement is made that it is either true or false. In my judgment Parliament never intended or contemplated for a moment that the Act should be used in this way, to make a

We accept the distinction drawn in this passage between statements of fact, past or present, and promises about the future, and agree with the view that s 14 deals with the first but not the second. A statement about the quality of a service already provided is a statement of past fact and is covered by the section. A statement
f of existing fact may also be covered, as, for example, if a hotel advertises that its services currently provided include the provision of afternoon tea; if that service is not being provided at the time when the statement is made an offence may be committed. A statement about existing facts would not cease to be within the section because the person making it warranted that it was true and that the facts would continue to exist in the future. In that limited sense the section can apply to warranties.
g But it does not apply to promises about the future unless, as we said earlier, the promise can be construed as an implied statement of a present intention or the like, in which case it may be that it is caught by s 14, as it would be by s 15 of the Theft Act 1968, which includes in its definition of deception false statements of present intentions.

In answer to the first question stated above, we hold that s 14 is limited to statements of fact, past or present, and does not include assurances about the future.
h It remains to consider the second question whether, on this reading of the section, the jury's verdict on counts 1, 2 and 6 or any of them can be upheld.

In the court below the prosecution contended that the words 'swimming pool' in the appellants' 1970 brochure meant that a swimming pool had already been built and was in existence on the date in January 1970, when Mr Bateman made his bookings. They seem to have contended in the alternative that the words meant j that a swimming pool would be in existence on 7th March 1970 which was the earliest date given in the brochure for bookings at the Hotel Cadi. They contended that in either case the statement was false. The appellants contended that the words related only to the future and meant that a swimming pool would be in existence on 27th May 1970, when Mr Bateman's bookings took effect. Both parties seem to have agreed that the words about push chairs, English dishes and special meals for children, related to the future in the case of this hotel which was not open in January 1970, when the statements about these matters were made. Neither party contended that if any of the statements related only to the future they were not caught by s 14. *Beckett v Cohen*¹ had not yet been decided, and the point which it established about the meaning of the section had apparently not occurred to counsel on either side or to the judge himself. The appellants' case was that the words about the pool, the chairs and the food all related to the future, and that the assurances on those matters were substantially fulfilled.

Other points of construction were raised by the appellants at the trial. What was meant by 'English dishes also available'? What was the meaning of 'special meals for children'? Did this mean special dishes or only special meal times? What was meant by 'Push chairs for hire'? Did this mean that there would be chairs for hire at the hotel itself, or would it be enough that there were chairs for hire in a neighbouring shop? Somebody had to construe the brochure to answer these questions of construction and the question whether the words about the swimming pool related to the present or the future. Both parties were agreed in the court below and before us that it was for the jury to construe the document as it would be in proceedings for libel. This was the view taken in the earlier case of *R v Clarksons Holidays Ltd*² and tacitly approved by this court to which the case was brought on appeal. Following this precedent we shall assume that this is the right course, observing only that if it is right statements in books on evidence which treat libel proceedings as the only exception to a rule that the construction of documents is for the judge may need to be revised: see Cross on Evidence³, and the article on Evidence in Halsbury's Laws of England⁴.

'You must ask first: "What do these statements mean?", beginning, as I suggest you should, by asking yourselves whether when [the appellants] made those statements they were representing to the people who read the brochure that the physical facilities, if I can so describe them, of the Hotel Cadi existed, as the prosecution suggest they were, on the date when Mr Bateman booked his holiday, namely, 7th January 1970; or were they representing that those facilities would exist on what was said to be the earliest possible booking date, 7th March 1970? . . . Or, third, [were the appellants] representing that those physical facilities would exist . . . when Mr Bateman arrived at the hotel, namely, 27th May? Those are the three possibilities.'

He returned to the point a little later:

'Of course, members of the jury, no one in their senses, perhaps, would want to go to swim in January there; and indeed many hotels, and indeed this hotel, were closed for the winter season. But the prosecution suggest that it might be important to clients or prospective clients reading the brochure to know whether or not the hotel was then completed, for they might, for example, not want to take the risk of booking for an uncompleted hotel; they might want to go to an hotel where, so to say, all the "gremlins" had been sorted out before they themselves took the plunge. And you are entitled to take the view, if you think it right, that those statements so made as to the physical facilities, namely, the swimming pool and the night club—counts 1, 3 and 5—were made in relation to 7th January 1970. The alternative view, as I have suggested, is

- a* that the statements were made in relation to 7th March when, so it is said, clients could book for the first time during the 1970 season. The third possibility is that the statements were made in relation to the time of Mr Bateman's arrival at the hotel. He, it is said, told Knights Travel Agency, and they knew full well, that he wanted a Whitsun holiday and that that should be a date which you should bear in mind. Which date you select is entirely a matter for you.
- b* The prosecution here say quite fairly that you should not select the earlier dates in relation to the push chairs and food, because clearly no one would suppose that they were saying that push chairs or food of any sort was available in January, because the hotel was then closed, and you may think the fair view so far as those items are concerned, namely, counts 2 and 6, would be to find that those statements were made, in truth and in fact, in relation to the date when Mr Bateman actually arrived, namely, 27th May. Go further, then, and
- c* in relation to the food and the push chairs consider the position on 27th May and, if your view is that the statements with regard to the swimming pool and the night club related also to the 27th May, consider the position as regards them also on that date.'

- What further direction ought the judge to have given the jury? If our reading of
- d* s 14 is right he should have told them, in the case of the swimming pool, that if they construed the words as relating to the future, which was the appellants' contention, they should acquit them on count 1, and that in any event, they should acquit them on counts 2 and 6 which both sides agreed related to the future. He did not do so, because this point had not been taken by the appellants. Instead he went on to direct the jury that having chosen the date to which any of these
- e* statements related, they should then consider whether it was true at that date, and if it were not and they found that it had been recklessly made they could convict the appellants. This was wrong.

- Counsel for the Crown in this court, asked, what did the appellants lose by the judge's failure to give the right direction on count 1? The answer is clear. They lost their chance of an acquittal on this count, which would have been their right
- f* if the jury construed the words about the swimming pool as relating to the future, as they may have done. We cannot uphold the conviction on this count, not knowing whether the jury construed the words as relating to 7th January, or whether they construed them as relating to 27th May and convicted the appellants only because they found that the swimming pool had not been completed by that date.

- Counsel for the Crown appeared to argue that even if s 14 were limited to state-
- g* ments of existing facts, the convictions on the three counts should still be upheld on the ground that the brochure impliedly represented that satisfactory arrangements had already been made by the appellants for the provision of these facilities or services in the future, and that such arrangements had not, in fact, been made on 7th January. This was not how the charges were framed in the indictment. It is not how the case was fought in the court below. It is not how the case was summed
- h* up by the judge. It is impossible to uphold these convictions on this or any other ground, and they must be quashed.

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE AND LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA

1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 7th MAY, 4th JULY 1973

Criminal law – Conspiracy – Indictable offence – Scope of offence – Agreement to do unlawful act – Tort – Trespass – Circumstances in which agreement to commit a tort indictable – Invasion of public domain – Intention to inflict more than purely nominal damage on victim – Agreement to enter and occupy building of High Commission of Sierra Leone.

Criminal law – Conspiracy – Indictment – Particulars of offence – Conspiracy to trespass – Necessity of alleging circumstances which render agreement indictable – Indictment Rules 1971 (SI 1971 No 1253), r 5 (1).

Criminal law – Unlawful assembly – Public place – Danger to peace and tranquillity of neighbourhood – Assembly inside building – Persons inside building put in fear – Whether necessary that assembly should be held in public place – Whether necessary to show that fear engendered outside building.

The appellants were students from Sierra Leone who held political opinions contrary to those of the political party in power in that country. In order to gain publicity for their grievances they agreed together to occupy the premises of the Sierra Leone High Commission in London. In pursuance of that agreement they went to the premises. The caretaker opened the door. The appellants entered, told the caretaker that he was under arrest and threatened him with an imitation firearm. He was then locked in a room and about ten other members of the staff were taken to the same room and locked in. Some were physically held or pushed but no actual blows were struck and there was no serious violence. The staff who saw the appellants' imitation gun thought that it was real. Eventually the police arrived and the staff were released. The appellants made no secret of their intention to take the premises over and that their object was to gain publicity for their grievances. The appellants were charged on an indictment which included two counts charging (1) conspiracy to trespass and (2) unlawful assembly. The particulars of the first count alleged that the appellants had 'conspired together and with other persons to enter as trespassers the High Commission of Sierra Leone in London'; the second, that the appellants had 'unlawfully assembled with intent to carry out a common purpose in such a manner as to endanger the public peace'. The appellants were convicted on both counts and appealed contending, inter alia, (i) that there was no such offence as conspiracy to trespass, and (ii) that an assembly inside a building could only be unlawful as endangering the public peace if it was shown that fear had been engendered in persons beyond the bounds of the building. The Court of Appeal^a affirmed the convictions holding, inter alia, that since an agreement to do an unlawful act was a conspiracy and the commission of a tort was an unlawful act, it followed that an agreement to commit any act of trespass was an indictable conspiracy. On appeal, a it did not follow that any agreement or combination to commit a tortious act against an individual was indictable as a conspiracy. A combination, the execution of which necessarily involved only a technical infringement of the civil rights of others, would not necessarily be indictable. However, trespass or any other form of tort could, if intended, form the element of illegality necessary in conspiracy if either (a) execution of the combination invaded the public domain, e.g. where a trespass involved the invasion of a building such as an embassy or a publicly owned building, or (b) the combination necessarily involved, and was intended to involve, the infliction on its victim of something more than purely nominal damage, e.g. where the intention was to occupy premises to the exclusion of the owner's right, either by expelling him altogether or otherwise effectively preventing him from enjoying his property (see p 1252 h and j, p 1254 e and f, p 1257 f, p 1258 a and b, p 1259 b, p 1260 h to p 1261 d, p 1262 d e and g and p 1263 e and h, post); dictum of Lord Ellenborough CJ in R v Turner (1811) 13 East at 231 approved; dicta of Lord Denman CJ in R v Jones (1832) 4 B & Ad at 349 and of Willes J in Mulcahy v R (1868) LR 3 HL at 317 explained.

(i) Although the offence of conspiracy was not limited to agreements to commit acts which if committed by a single person would be punishable by criminal sanctions,

c (ii) The first count of the indictment had been drawn with sufficient particularity to ground a conviction for the offence charged since it disclosed that the property on which the trespass was to be committed was the High Commission of Sierra Leone (see p 1249 h and j, p 1262 d and e and p 1263 h, post).

d (iii) In order to prove that an assembly was unlawful it was not necessary to show that it had occurred in a public place. The essential requisite was the presence or likely presence of innocent third parties not participating in the illegal activities in question; it was the danger to their security which constituted the threat to public peace and the public element necessary to the commission of the offence. Accordingly, where an assembly had taken place in a building, it was not necessary, in proving the crime of unlawfully assembling in such manner as to disturb the public peace, to show that fear was engendered in persons beyond the bounds of the building; it was sufficient that rational and firm persons in the building had been frightened (see p 1247 j, p 1248 b to e and g h and p 1262 d to f, post); Button v Director of Public Prosecutions [1965] 3 All ER 587 applied.

e Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC. Under the Indictment Rules 1971, r 5 (1)^b, where an indictment charges conspiracy to trespass it is essential to state in the particulars of the offence the intention or other special circumstances which must accompany the trespass in order to render the agreement indictable (see p 1262 a to c, post).

f Per Lord Cross of Chelsea. An indictment charging as a criminal conspiracy an agreement to commit an act or acts which would not constitute a crime if done by a single person should always state with precision the circumstances on which the Crown relies as justification for treating the agreement as a criminal offence. It is for the judge to decide as a matter of law whether the circumstances alleged are sufficient to render the agreement to commit the act or acts in question a criminal offence (see p 1263 f and h to p 1264 a, post).

g Decision of the Court of Appeal sub nom R v Kamara [1972] 3 All ER 999 affirmed on different grounds.

Sheku Gibril Kamara, Unisa Sallia Kamara, Moulai Moubarack Kamara, Frederick Wosm Kamara, Joseph Adewole John, Henry Olufemi John, Joseph Bandabla Dauda, Bianca Benjamin and Mohamed Lahai Samura appealed with leave against the order of the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division¹ (Lawton LJ, Swanwick and Phillips JJ) dated 11th October 1972 dismissing their appeals against conviction at the Central Criminal Court before his Honour Judge McKinnon and a jury on 8th November 1971 on charges of conspiracy to trespass (count 1), unlawful assembly (count 2), and, in the case of the appellants Joseph Adewole John and Mohamed Lahai Samura, having an imitation firearm with intent to commit an indictable offence, contrary to s 18 (1) of the Firearms Act 1968 (count 3). The facts are set out in the opinion of

h Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC.

 Michael Corkery and Alexander Millar for the Crown.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- j 4th July. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC. My Lords, the indictment which gives rise to the present appeal contains three counts. The first two counts, with which alone we are concerned, and which apply equally to all the appellants and to two other defendants who have not appealed, are in the following terms:

'FIRST COUNT

Statement of Offence
CONSPIRACY TO TRESPASS
Particulars of Offence

[The names of the appellants, 11 in number] on divers days between the 18th day of January 1971 and the 22nd day of January 1971 within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court conspired together and with other persons to enter as trespassers the premises of the High Commission of Sierra Leone in London.

'SECOND COUNT

Statement of Offence
UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY
Particulars of Offence

[The appellants] on the 21st day of January 1971 within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court unlawfully assembled with intent to carry out a common purpose in such a manner as to endanger the public peace.'

There was a third count applying only to the appellants Joseph Adewole John and Mohamed Lahai Samura, of having an imitation firearm with intent to commit an indictable offence contrary to s 18 (1) of the Firearms Act 1968. We are not in this appeal concerned with this third count. No separate question has been certified or argued relating to it, and it has been agreed that its fate depends on the questions arising in respect of the first two. If, as the result of this appeal, either of the two convictions stand, the conviction on the third count stands also. But if both the other convictions are quashed, the conviction on the third count falls with them.

My Lords, I cull the facts which gave rise to the present proceedings, without exactly quoting it, mainly from the judgment of Lawton LJ who delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division¹.

The appellants are all students from Sierra Leone, and hold political opinions contrary to those held by the party in power there. Seeking to obtain greater publicity in this country for their grievances, in about January 1971 they and the two other defendants to the proceedings agreed together to occupy the premises of the Sierra Leone High Commission in Portland Place and hold a demonstration there. In pursuance of this agreement, at about 8.30 a.m. on 21st January 1971, they went to the premises and the caretaker opened the door. A number of them entered. One of the appellants told the caretaker that he was under arrest. Another threatened the caretaker with a toy pistol which he mistook for a genuine firearm. The caretaker was then locked in one of the rooms of the High Commission, and about ten more of the staff were brought into the same room and locked in. Some of these, including the caretaker, were physically held, or pushed. But no actual blows were struck, and thus, though there was clearly illegal force to persons, and to property, there was no serious violence, and no one was injured. Some at least of the staff were at first inclined to think that they were the victims of some kind of prank or practical joke, but they changed their minds when they saw the toy gun, which, like the caretaker, they thought was real. There was some interference with the telephone; in spite of this, or before it had been accomplished, the caretaker succeeded in telephoning the police. The appellants also used the telephone to communicate with the press and television networks in accordance with their general design, as a result of which they held a conference.

When the police arrived, the appellants told them there had been a coup in Sierra Leone, and gave them to understand that they were authorised by a supposed new regime to take over the High Commission premises. The result of this was that a at first the police did not interfere. But later more police officers came, the imprisoned staff escaped, and the appellants were interviewed by the police. They made no secret of their intention to take the premises over and that their object was to gain publicity for their political grievances. They were charged with various offences and these charges finally ripened into the indictment which I have already described.

b Although the fact is not material to the decision of this appeal, it is fair to the appellants and to their co-defendants, none of whom received a custodial sentence, to stress, as did counsel appearing for them, that, though there was the degree of deception and of illegal force which I have described, they appear to have been reasonably careful to see that no one was seriously harmed, and their motives were not necessarily contemptible. They acted from a genuine sense of grievance. The father of c at least one of them was, we were told, under sentence of death at the time of the alleged offence, and all appear genuinely to have believed that the government in power in their country, though recognised by Her Majesty's Government here, was arbitrary, tyrannical and unconstitutional. We, of course, are not concerned with these matters, and, whatever the result of this appeal, it is not possible to approve their actions. At the same time, the facts as stated enable us to approach their d behaviour and their motives, if without endorsement, at least on the assumption that they acted sincerely, and, within certain limits, with restraint.

As the result of their proceedings the appellants appeared at the Central Criminal Court before Judge McKinnon. They pleaded not guilty, and after a trial lasting 11 days the jury returned a verdict of guilty on each of the three counts. From these convictions they have appealed. The main contentions on the part of the appellants are pure questions of law. On the facts some of them gave evidence that they
e thought they had a right to be on the High Commission premises, either because students were allowed to use the games or information rooms, or because it was said, by one or more of them, that the acting High Commissioner had given them permission to act as they did. I mention this because an attempt was made both in the Court of Appeal¹ and before your Lordships' House to impugn the learned judge's f summing-up on various grounds connected with this defence. I need say no more about any of these points except that the Court of Appeal¹ was right to reject them, and I agree with their reasons for so doing. They raise no questions of general interest or importance.

In hearing, and dismissing, their appeal against conviction, the Court of Appeal¹ certified two points of law raised in the case as being of general public importance, and gave leave to appeal to the House of Lords. The two points so certified were:

'(1) whether an agreement to commit a trespass can be an indictable conspiracy and, if so, in what circumstances; (2) whether it is necessary in proving the crime of unlawfully assembling in such a manner as to disturb the public peace to show that fear was engendered in persons beyond the bounds of a building.'

h We are, of course, not limited to these questions, but, speaking for myself, in the absence of prejudice to the appellants I am not disposed to stray beyond them and, in the view which I have formed, only the former of them raises difficult problems. I deal, therefore, with the second question first. As to this, which is the only question relating to the second count, I share the view of the Court of Appeal¹ that the logic implicit in the decision in *Button v Director of Public Prosecutions*² (a case of affray)
i requires that we should come to an analogous decision in the present case in a sense adverse to the appellants. I also agree with Lawton LJ that such a decision would also be correct even if the matter were res integra. So long ago as 1824 (the year in which the eighth edition of Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown was published) unlawful assembly was grouped with, amongst other crimes, affrays, forcible entries and detainers, riots, threatening letters, and libels, in a chapter headed 'Offences against the Public Peace'. A similar classification is to be found in the more familiar Archbold¹. It was an essential part of the argument for the appellants that the public peace could only be broken in a public place. I agree with Lawton LJ when he said²:

'Both affray and unlawful assembly belong to the group of common law offences designed to uphold public order and to protect the public generally against lawlessness and disorder and in our judgment the same concepts should apply to both offences. As with affray, the public peace can be endangered by a rowdy, disorderly meeting just as much as if it is held inside a building as outside. In this case there was ample evidence that a number of persons inside were scared as well they might have been. The fact that no one outside was is of no importance.'

The appellants sought to rely on a number of cases in which unlawful assembly was defined by judicial authority by use of some such phrase as 'terror and alarm in the neighbourhood' (cf *R v Stephens*³, per Patteson J; *R v Vincent*⁴, per Alderson B). I agree with Lawton LJ⁵ that in those cases 'in the neighbourhood' must be read in the context as simply the equivalent of those nearby. I note that in the earliest definition at which I have looked, namely, that contained in the first edition of Hawkins⁶, the expression 'neighbourhood' is not used, but the expression is 'such circumstances of terror as cannot but endanger the public peace'. I consider that the public peace is in question when either an affray or a riot or unlawful assembly takes place in the presence of innocent third parties. It was accepted on behalf of the appellants that a riot can take place in enclosed premises, e.g. Dartmoor Prison. But an unlawful assembly is only an inchoate riot: see Russell on Crime⁷. When this was pointed out to him, counsel for the appellants was driven to argue that, if rioters in Dartmoor beat the warders inside the prison, they would be rioting, but they would not be guilty of an unlawful assembly unless the noise from inside the prison frightened some of Her Majesty's lieges outside the prison. I find this contention wholly unattractive. No doubt unlawful assembly differs from an affray, because, unlike affray, it implies a common purpose, and because, unlike affray, actual violence is unnecessary provided the public peace is endangered, but in my view it is analogous to affray in that (1) it need not be in a public place and (2) that the essential requisite in both is the presence or likely presence of innocent third parties, members of the public not participating in the illegal activities in question. It is their presence, or the likelihood of it, and the danger to their security in each case which constitutes the threat to public peace and the public element necessary to the commission of each offence. I therefore answer the second question certified by the Court of Appeal by saying that it is not necessary in proving the crime of unlawfully assembling in such manner as to disturb the public peace to show that fear was engendered beyond the bounds of the building. It follows that, in my view, the second count in the indictment must stand and therefore also the conviction on the third count, on which, for the reason I have given, no separate question arises.

The arguments affecting the first count are not to be dealt with so simply. They affect one of the most difficult and controversial branches of our criminal law, namely,

- a the law of conspiracy. From the very first the appellants have contended that the first count of the indictment discloses no offence known to the law; in the alternative, counsel for the appellants argued that conspiracy to trespass can only become an offence if committed maliciously or fraudulently. He argued that this was not the case here; alternatively, he argued that the first count was defective since either the statement or the particulars of the offence should have alleged malice or fraud
- b if this were to be relied on. Indeed, counsel for the appellants put his case extremely high. Despite a mass of judicial and textbook authority to the contrary, he argued that not merely was a conspiracy to commit trespass not an offence known to the law, but that no combination to commit a tort or other civil wrong is indictable as a crime, unless that tort or civil wrong be a crime if committed by a single person. If anyone had averred or decided the contrary, he argued, that was wrong, and, though the error might be an old one, he urged us to unmask it with all the courage which
- c your Lordships' House showed when dealing with affray in Button's case¹.

These questions on the first count the trial judge, his Honour Judge McKinnon, decided against the appellants on the comparatively narrow ground that, on the basis of the proposition in *Russell on Crime*², the indictment was properly drawn. The proposition reads:

- d 'A combination to violate without just cause private rights, contractual or other, in which the public has a sufficient interest is a criminal conspiracy if the violation of the private right is an actionable wrong.'

In applying this proposition to the facts of the present case, Judge McKinnon said:

- e 'Undoubtedly, trespass is an actionable wrong, and it seems to me that undoubtedly, as a matter of law, the public has a sufficient interest in maintaining the territorial integrity of a High Commission of a member of the Commonwealth when the High Commission is in London, and, therefore, any combination to enter the High Commission without just cause a combination arising by way of agreement would amount to a criminal conspiracy.'

- f He later directed the jury in accordance with this ruling. The Court of Appeal agreed with this reasoning, and, after referring to the terms of the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964, Lawton LJ said³:

- g 'It follows that the accused's occupation of the High Commission's premises was more than an infringement of the High Commission's property rights. Their conduct called for action by the police in discharge of Her Majesty's Government's statutory duties. The public interest was clearly involved.'

- I too agree with this reasoning, and it follows that, if this were the only issue on the first count, the only question really to be decided is whether the indictment is properly drawn so as to support a conviction for this offence. In a sense this is so, since it turned out during the course of the discussion that counsel for the Crown only sought
- h to defend the form of the indictment in the view of the law which he urged on your Lordships on the basis that it identified the premises invaded as the embassy or high commission of a friendly power or member of the Commonwealth. Counsel for the appellants claimed that the indictment was insufficient, and that the statement and particulars of offence should be drawn so as to specify the class of trespass an agreement to commit which was alleged to be indictable. On this I agree with the
- i argument for the Crown and, even if I did not, since no prejudice to the accused is even arguably involved, I would not be in the least disposed to advise the House to exercise its discretion to consider matters outside the questions certified.

But the Court of Appeal¹ did not confine itself to justifying the convictions on the basis solely of the ground contained in the ruling of the trial judge. Although counsel for the Crown urged the court, as he did also your Lordships, to take a more restrictive view of the law, the Court of Appeal¹ in effect decided that all agreements to commit a trespass were indictable without exception. The argument as developed by Lawton LJ was, in effect, that conspiracy is an agreement either to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. Trespass is a tort and therefore an unlawful act. It follows that an agreement to commit a trespass is, by definition, a conspiracy, and therefore indictable. He did not hesitate to accept that such a definition would, at least in theory, open the door to indictments for trivial breaches of the civil law. For instance, if two tired wayfarers agree, without permission and without claim to a right of way, to take a short cut across another's land, they could, at least in theory, end up, on this argument, in the Crown Court on a charge of conspiracy, despite the contrary opinion expressed by Lord Ellenborough CJ in *R v Turner*², and I think by many others after him. Lawton LJ³ felt bound to pursue the logic of this reasoning 'no matter what absurd results can be envisaged if prosecutors and judges do not use common sense' and though recognising that this reliance on the common sense of prosecutors and judges might be unpalatable, he pointed out with complete accuracy that this situation is met with elsewhere in the criminal law.

Between these two extreme views, counsel for the Crown expounded an intermediate doctrine. According to his submission, there can be an indictable conspiracy to commit any tort, but only in certain circumstances, which he sought to categorise as being cases either (i) where the public interest is affected, or (ii) where the nature of the conspiracy is a matter of public concern. In the former category he would include the present case, where, for instance, there was a concerted invasion of a foreign embassy. He equated such an instance with other cases, for instance, where the combination involved infraction of the criminal law, or where the courts had decided that the agreement was to effect a public mischief, as for instance, in *R v Brailsford*⁴, *R v Porter*⁵, *R v Bassey*⁶, *R v Newland*⁷, *R v Bramley*⁸ (of the summing-up in which we were supplied with a transcript) briefly noticed in the Journal of Criminal Law.

In the latter category (that is, combinations to commit a tort where the nature of the combination is a matter of public concern) counsel for the Crown included (1) torts against individuals the execution of which include elements of fraud, as, for instance, *R v Kenrick*⁹, *R v Warburton*¹⁰, *R v Aspinall*¹¹, and many others too numerous to mention; (2) torts against individuals, the execution of which included the use of force. I do not think he cited any particular examples of this, unless the trade union cases were categorised under this head (cf *R v Duffield*¹², *R v Druitt*¹³, *R v Bunn*¹⁴). In a third group within his second category, counsel classified (3) torts the execution of which include a mental element which he described as an intent to injure or annoy.

a In this he included such cases as *R v Levy*¹ and various statements by individual judges in a whole variety of cases, which I shall be discussing later.

It will be seen that both of the extreme views, namely, that contended for by counsel for the appellants and that adopted by the Court of Appeal², have manifest attractions from the point of view of simplicity. The intermediate view contended for by counsel for the Crown, indeed any view consistent with authority and intermediate between the two extremes, presents great difficulties of definition, principle and application. Some of these at least were summarised by Lawton LJ in supporting his own thesis, and, since I am not following that thesis in the present case, it is fair to him that I should quote the passage, which is as follows³:

c 'Before passing from this topic we would like to invite attention to the difficulties which would arise if there were any such limitations on the offence as suggested. If conspirators' intents had to be considered, judges and juries would almost certainly find themselves struggling with the casuist problems of greater or lesser evils, maybe with the same kind of results as were ridiculed by Pascal. If the public interest is to be considered, as counsel for the Crown suggested, who is to decide what it is? The judge? Or the jury? Are either competent? Should evidence be admitted on this issue? If not, why not? If the judge is to decide, he may well take the verdict from the jury; if the jury are to decide part of the law of conspiracy can be stated in four words: "salus populi, suprema lex". The commonly accepted opinion that trespass is an unlawful act to which Willes J's definition can be applied could produce absurdities; but so far in practice they have been avoided because of the common sense of those who are concerned with the administration of criminal justice; they pay heed to the maxim "de minimis non curat lex"—and not only in relation to the law of conspiracy. The clerk who uses one of his employer's envelopes for a personal letter may well be committing theft; but he is no more likely to be prosecuted for it than those who agree to take a short cut across a field are likely to be prosecuted for conspiracy to trespass.'

f I propose now to deal with this difficult problem under three separate heads, and then to state a conclusion in the form of a number of propositions. My three heads can be stated best as three questions: (i) is conspiracy limited to agreements to perpetrate conduct which if done by a single person would be punishable by criminal sanctions? And, if not, are agreements which involve the commission of a tort against individuals so limited? (ii) If conspiracies are not limited to conduct punishable by criminal sanctions, are all combinations the execution of which involves a tort or torts committed against individuals indictable as conspiracies? (iii) If all combinations involving tortious conduct are not indictable, is there any rational principle on which those which are indictable can be separated from those which are not? Before I seek to answer these questions I will enumerate one or two propositions about which there is no doubt, and which may act to some extent as a guide to help us through this complex discussion.

h (1) It is common ground that the actus reus in a conspiracy is the agreement to execute the illegal conduct, and not the execution of it. The crime is complete when the agreement is made. This proposition, first decided in 1611 in the *Poulterers' Case*⁴, is too familiar to require further authority.

j (2) In spite of this, mens rea is an essential ingredient in the crime of conspiracy. This mens rea consists in the intention to execute the illegal elements in the conduct contemplated by the agreement, in the knowledge of those facts which render the conduct illegal (cf *Churchill v Walton*⁵).

(3) It seems fairly clear that while a mistake of law is not a good defence, a sincere belief in a state of facts which if true would render the illegal conduct legal would be a good answer to any charge of conspiracy. For instance, if conspiracy to trespass be a crime, belief in a state of facts which would give rise to an enforceable right of way would be a defence. Equally, it would be a defence to a charge of conspiracy to defame by the publication of defamatory matter that the accused genuinely and without express malice believed in facts which would establish a privilege. On general principles in all these cases the burden would rest on the prosecution to exclude these defences, which I will describe as a claim of right made in good faith.

(4) Whether or not it be true that a combination to commit a tort is indictable, there are a number of torts which are not complete unless damage actually follows. It follows that, to be indictable, an agreement, the object of which is to commit any of these torts, must include an intention to inflict actual damage. Thus, apart from statute, agreement to be guilty of carelessness is not an agreement to do an act which is unlawful unless it be intended that damage should actually follow. The same must be true of various types of occupiers' liability, and of any case of torts involving strict liability, such as damage arising from cattle trespass, from an attack by the dog who has accomplished his traditional first bite, or from the keeping on one's land of animals ferae naturae, or from an agreement to publish, by word of mouth only, defamatory matter not actionable per se. In considering the question whether conspiracy to commit a tort is indictable it is not possible in principle to avoid the question of intention and, in particular, of intention as to damage. Incidentally, this must also be true of any action based on deceit since the tort consists in obtaining something valuable as the result of a false pretence.

(5) Trespass is actionable irrespective of the consequences of the trespass. But most of the trespasses, a combination to commit which are in practice under discussion as conspiracies, are either trespasses which are in fact also crimes as being a breach of the statutes of forcible entry and detainer (the latter of which offences is no less a breach of the statutes as the former) and if there are any which are not also breaches of some or all of these statutes they are, in fact, agreements not merely to infringe the rights of the victim, as by walking over his close without committing damage therein, but, as here, agreements which would involve something more than nominal damage, for example, actually to exclude him altogether from possession (cf per Lord Denman CJ in *R v Kenrick*¹) or at least so to use his land or his chattel as to deprive him of any effectual enjoyment of it or some part of it during the execution of the combination.

(i) Is conspiracy limited to agreements involving conduct which if done by a single person would be punishable as a crime?

In my opinion, it is now far too late without legislation to establish, even were it otherwise desirable, that indictable conspiracy is limited to cases where the illegal elements in the action contemplated would be punishable as a crime if committed by a single individual. I base this view partly on the history of the matter, and partly on a multiplicity of judicial dicta and decisions to this effect.

The early history of conspiracy is dealt with in considerable detail in the well-known work on the subject by R S Wright² (later Wright J) now in its centenary year, to which we were referred in the course of argument. I have also referred to Holdsworth's *History of English Law*³. Both make it clear that from the first the law has never confined indictable conspiracy to agreements to do that which if done by one person would itself constitute a crime. It is clear that there always was some common law crime of conspiracy, since it is referred to both in Bracton and Britton, a though what it was is not at all plain, and, whatever it was, from the reign of Edward I the common law was supplemented or declared by a series of statutes, it being remembered that, in medieval days, a statute was often merely a way of advertising or emphasising a common law rule or providing additional methods of enforcement. The main subject-matter of the early conspiracies was what we would now call conspiracies to defeat or pervert the course of justice. They certainly included one tort, namely, that which we should now call malicious prosecution; indeed, it appears b that that tort itself was developed as an action on the case on the analogy of the writ of conspiracy and replaced it since it would apply even when there was only one defendant. In the early cases, and under the strict words of the statute (which applied both to the civil and the criminal remedies) the crime, like the tort, was only complete when not merely was the unlawful purpose executed but, in addition, the defendant c acquitted. As time went on, it appears that the criminal element tended to disappear and the tort to predominate in the use made of the statute in the common law courts. But in the *Poulterers' Case*¹ it seems to have been decided once and for all that the essence of the crime of conspiracy lay in the unlawful agreement and not in its execution, and the principle of this decision was taken over by the Court of King's d Star Chamber, and the principle has ever after remained undisputed. For some time the most frequent subject of conspiracies (other than those directly concerned with politics) continued to be concerned with the defeat or perversion of the course of justice, though various statutes between Edward III and Elizabeth I were directed against, for instance, treasonable combinations, combinations for breaches of the peace, and, with a strangely modern ring, combinations by merchants to disturb e the markets or prices, or to raise prices, and against corresponding combinations on the part of labourers to raise wages and alter hours. During the latter part of the 17th century and the 18th century, the law of conspiracy began to develop over a fairly wide scale. The odd case of *R v Sterling*², as explained by Holt CJ in *R v Daniell*³, testifies to the development of conspiracy to commit what would now be described as a public mischief, when the combination was directed, for instance, against the f revenue, and by the time of the publication of the first edition of Hawkins Pleas of the Crown⁴ the law had accepted some sort of obligation to protect in addition the rights of the individual against a conspiracy by two or more persons to prejudice an individual wrongfully, since Hawkins boldly, but as has been pointed out by textbook writers, too boldly, asserted that 'all confederacies whatsoever wrongfully to prejudice a third person are highly criminal at common law'. As I have just said, it has g been pointed out that the authorities cited in support of this proposition do not fully support it. Quite apart from all else, the statement must be inadequate if only because it gives no adequate account of the mental element in the crime of conspiracy, while the word 'wrongfully' so long as it remains undefined begs a number of difficult questions of definition. What is clear, however, is that by this time a number of acts which, if done by a person singly, would not be punishable, were h considered to become indictable conspiracies if two or more persons agreed to do them in combination and that these could include at least some combinations to effect a public mischief, and some at least to injure by means of tort. In its origin, therefore, the crime of conspiracy was not confined to what would be punishable in an individual. By the beginning of the 18th century it included, as it always had, an agreement to commit the tort of malicious prosecution. It included also certain combinations to effect a public mischief. It also included an ill-defined class of i combinations to effect unlawful prejudice to the individual.

These classes of case have existed more or less from the beginning up to and including the present day. In my view, all these types survive. I have already noticed statutory prohibition against merchants rigging the market. More modern examples of conspiracy to effect a public mischief, usually by fraud, of the same kind but not containing any reference to statute, are *R v De Berenger*¹, which was a case of conspiracy to affect the price of government funds by false rumours of Napoleon's death; *R v Aspinall*², which was a conspiracy to cheat and defraud prospective purchasers of shares by a false prospectus; *R v Lewis*³, which was a conspiracy to defraud the public by means of a mock auction in which the bidders were not genuine and bid only for the purpose of selling goods at inflated prices; *R v Brailsford*⁴, which was a conspiracy to obtain a passport (then only required, I believe, for travel to Imperial Russia) by means of false representations; *R v Porter*⁵, which was an agreement (without fraud) to indemnify against bail; *R v Bassey*⁶, which was an agreement to obtain admission as a barrister by divers fraudulent devices; *R v Newland*⁷, which was an agreement by fraud to divert goods from the export to the domestic market contrary to the policy of the regulations then in force, but without an actual breach of these regulations. Other examples of conspiracy to commit a public mischief which was not or may not have been otherwise criminal by means other than fraud include: *R v Young*⁸, which was a combination to remove a dead body, since the hearing of this case followed in the Court of Appeal in *R v Hunter*⁹; *R v Lynn*¹⁰, which was a conspiracy to bring about a marriage by violence, threats and contrivance; *R v Howell*¹¹, which was a conspiracy to procure a woman to become a prostitute; *R v Mears and Chalk*¹², to defile a girl of 15 years (not at that time criminal). I also consider that the so-called conspiracy to corrupt public morals is of this class: see *Kneller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹³; *Shaw v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹⁴. I have no hesitation myself in adding the present type of case to this list for the reasons stated by Judge McKinnon and Lawton LJ¹⁵ since this was a conspiracy to trespass by invading a foreign embassy or Commonwealth high commission and, with the Court of Appeal¹⁵, I consider that a public interest is directly involved in such an act. It will be seen that, in my view, this is not the only trespass capable of forming the basis of an indictment, but, subject, to any question about the adequacy of the indictment, it would alone justify conviction on the first count in this case. I do not regard the categories of conspiracy to effect a public mischief as closed, or even as capable of being closed, but extension should be very closely and jealously watched by the courts, owing to the difficulty of riding the horse of public policy and the danger of applying the subjective criteria of individual judges to the concept. See, for instance, the remarks of Bowen LJ in *Mogul Steamship Co v McGregor Gow & Co*¹⁶ where he says:

- a* 'In the application of this undoubted principle it is necessary to be very careful not to press the doctrine of illegal conspiracy beyond that which is necessary for the protection of individuals, or of the public ...'

He adds¹:

- b* '... it may be observed in passing that as a rule it is the damage wrongfully done, and not the conspiracy, that is the gist of actions on the case for conspiracy ...'

The danger of extending the doctrine of conspiracy at the present day is also well illustrated by the fate of the prosecution in *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*², which is to be contrasted with *R v Newland*³. The former was an unsuccessful attempt by the Crown to extend the doctrine of public mischief to combination without fraud, but with clandestinity to do an otherwise lawful act in a field which had already been fully covered by statute law.

- c* But even if I were of the opinion that the whole history of the crime did not declare it to be otherwise, I would not find myself able to accept the appellants' submission that only combinations to do what was otherwise criminal are indictable as conspiracies. The whole weight of modern judicial authority to the contrary, especially in the field of combinations to commit a tort, is far too strong. I cull the following quotations almost at random: it would be possible to discover many more. Apart from the 'Denman Antithesis'⁴ (mentioned later) one of the first is that of Cockburn CJ in *R v Warburton*⁵: 'It is enough if the acts agreed to be done, although not criminal, are wrongful ...'

- e* As was pointed out by Barry J in *R v Parnell*⁶, the view of Cockburn CJ in *R v Warburton*⁵ was elaborated at length in the report of the Royal Commission of which he was chairman, from which Barry J quoted at length, concluding with the sentence in the report with which Barry J concurred⁷:

- f* 'The law has therefore, and it seems to us wisely and justly established that a combination of persons to commit a wrongful act with a view to injure another, shall be an offence, though the act if done by one would amount to no more than a civil wrong.'

Or again, Lord Brampton in *Quinn v Leatham*⁸ said:

- g* 'Much consideration of the matter has led me to be convinced that a number of actions and things not in themselves actionable or unlawful if done separately without conspiracy may, with conspiracy, become dangerous and alarming ...'
- In an earlier passage he had defined conspiracy as⁹:

- h* '... an unlawful combination of two or more persons to do that which is contrary to law, or to do that which is wrongful and harmful towards another person.'

In a widely known passage in his judgment of the Court of Appeal in the Mogul case¹, Bowen LJ had said, immediately before the passage I have just quoted:

- h* 'Of the general proposition, that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several, there can be no doubt.'

In the House of Lords' report of the same case, Lord Halsbury LC said words to the same effect¹:

'Intimidation, violence, molestation, or the procuring of people to break their contracts, are all of them unlawful acts; and I entertain no doubt that a combination to procure people to do such acts is a conspiracy and unlawful.'

In *Boots v Grundy*² Bigham J is reported as saying:

'No conspiracy is, in my opinion, known to the law which has not for its object the accomplishment of an unlawful act (not necessarily a criminal act) . . .'

In *R v Whitaker*³ Lawrence J said:

'To make a good count for conspiracy it is not necessary that the agreement should be an agreement to commit a crime; it is enough if it be an agreement to do an act which is unlawful or wrongful in the sense of tortious. At any rate this is so where the agreement is to do an act of fraud or corruption. There is authority for saying that an agreement to commit a mere trespass is not necessarily a misdemeanour. If that be law, as to which doubts have been expressed by eminent judges, it is clear that where the tort is one of fraud or corruption an agreement to commit it is a misdemeanour at common law.'

The learned judge went on to refer to *R v Warburton*⁴ and *R v Aspinall*⁵.

No doubt whatever is cast on these views by Viscount Simon LC in *Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co Ltd v Veitch*⁶, nor by Lord Reid in his minority judgment in *Shaw v Director of Public Prosecutions*⁷, where he said:

'Then there is undoubtedly a third class of act which an individual can do with impunity but a combination cannot. Perhaps the best known example is conspiring to injure a man in his trade if done without justification.'

And Lord Reid went on to refer to the *Mogul*⁸ and *Harris Tweed*⁶ cases. In *Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co Ltd v Veitch*⁹ Lord Simon LC had said:

'The question to be answered, in determining whether a combination to do an act which damages others is actionable even though it would not be actionable if done by a single person, is not: "Did the combiners appreciate, or should they be treated as appreciating, that others would suffer from their action?" It is: "What is the real reason why the combiners did it?" . . . The analysis of human impulses soon leads us into the quagmire of mixed motives, and, even if we avoid the word "motive," there may be more than a single purpose or object. It is enough to say that, if there is more than one purpose actuating a combination, liability must depend on ascertaining the predominant purpose. If that predominant purpose is to damage another person and damage results, that is tortious conspiracy.'

It is to be observed that Lord Simon LC was referring in terms not to criminal, but to 'tortious conspiracy', the first example I can find of a suggestion the conspiracy could be tortious, but not criminal. I do not think Lord Simon LC meant to suggest

- a this except in one limited sense. The difference between tortious and criminal conspiracy is that conspiracy giving rise to an action for damages being an action on the case must (1) have been put into execution and (2) have given rise to actual damage, whereas in a criminal conspiracy, since the *Poulterers' Case*¹, the agreement, and not the execution of the agreement in whole or in part, is the 'gist of the indictment' or the actus reus (see per Lord Brampton in *Quinn v Leatham*²). Lord Simon LC, however, does in fact suggest that the object of a conspiracy may be illegal if it be to injure another even if the means are not individually tortious provided that this the 'predominant purpose' of the combination. It is not necessary to decide in the present case whether this be so though there are some authorities which can be quoted in this sense. Lord Halsbury LC said in the Mogul case³:

- c 'I am unable to concur with the Lord Chief Justice's criticism⁴ (if its meaning was rightly interpreted, which I very much doubt) on the observations made by my noble and learned friend Lord Bramwell in *Reg. v. Druitt*⁵, if that was intended to treat as doubtful the proposition that a combination to insult and annoy a person would be an indictable conspiracy. I should have thought it as beyond doubt or question that such a combination would be an indictable misdemeanour.'

- d There are also a number of decisions which support this view. Such for instance are *R v Levy*⁶, a combination to upset a woman in labour, although in that case the combination probably also involved nuisance or trespass, that does not appear to be the ground of decision. So also it has been said that a combination to ruin an actor by hissing him off the stage may be indictable (cf *Clifford v Brandon*⁷, per Mansfield CJ; *Gregory v Duke of Brunswick*⁸; *R v Leigh*⁹). What does emerge from this group of citations, including Lord Simon LC's speech in the Harris Tweed case¹⁰, is the possibility that the intention or object of those concerned in a combination may be an important factor in determining the question whether a conspiracy to do that which is unlawful, but not, if done by an individual, a crime, may play an important part in deciding whether a combination to injure an individual is indictable.

- f (1) A combination to do that which is a crime, whether triable summarily (cf *R v Blamires Transport Services Ltd*¹¹) or on indictment, is an indictable conspiracy. Thus I have little doubt that a combination to commit trespass in such a manner as to break the statutes of forcible entry and detainer is a criminal conspiracy, and though this was not the course taken here, I have little doubt but that it could have been taken here, and could be taken in the vast majority of the squatting cases, or the 'sit in' cases, or many of the cases in which sports grounds are forcibly occupied or disrupted (cf *R v Bramley*¹² and the transcript of Stable J's summing-up to which we were referred, and which was briefly noticed in the Journal of Criminal Law). As to forcible entry and detainer, see Halsbury's *Laws of England*¹³, *R v Bramley*¹² (where the charges included one under the Statutes of Forcible Entry) and *R v Britain*¹⁴.

(2) A combination to commit a public mischief can be indictable. The categories here are not closed, and I have no doubt that they include a combination to trespass on or occupy a foreign embassy or a Commonwealth high commission, the inviolability of which Her Majesty's Government are under an obligation to protect. I feel certain, too, that there are many other public buildings owned by the authorities in this country to which the same considerations would apply.

(3) A combination to commit a tortious act may be a crime, even if authority does not compel us to the view that all combinations to commit a tort are indictable. I now therefore come to consider the second question which I have proposed, namely: (ii) If conspiracies are not limited to conduct punishable by criminal sanctions, are all combinations the execution of which involves the commission of a tort against individuals criminally punishable as conspiracies?

In deciding that they were, Lawton LJ¹ rested heavily on what has become the classical definition of conspiracy which he cited from the advice of the judges in *Mulcahy v R*² given by Willes J:

‘A conspiracy consists . . . in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means.’

Clearly, this definition is wide enough to include combinations to commit any tort and perhaps any breach of contract, but I desire to say something of its history, since, although I accept the definition, I do not think, in the context in which it has been used in the past, it supports the weight which has been rested on it in the Court of Appeal.

This classical definition of conspiracy in fact owes its origin to Lord Denman CJ and not to Willes J in *Mulcahy v R*². In its original form it was known as ‘Lord Denman’s antithesis’ and appears first to have been used by Lord Denman CJ in 1832 in *R v Jones*³ for the purpose of making absolute a motion in arrest of judgment and again, for the same purpose in 1834, in *R v Seward*⁴. It was never intended, on the lips of Lord Denman CJ, either to confine the expression ‘unlawful’ to conduct which if committed by a single person would be criminal or to extend it to all conduct which, in any of the senses to which the vague term ‘unlawful’ can be applied, can be described as unlawful or illegal. In a later case, *R v Peck*⁵, Lord Denman CJ corrected counsel, who quoted it to him, with the words: ‘I do not think the antithesis very correct’ and in *King v R*⁶, he clearly explained the phrase by amending it and saying that he would wish to insert the phrase ‘at least’, presumably at the beginning. In each case where he used the phrase he was in fact protesting, as did the House of Lords in the Mogul case⁷, against attempts at extending the definition of conspiracy to cases where the acts involved in the combination involved no element of illegality in any sense whatsoever. In *Mulcahy v R*⁸ the advice of the judge was being given in the context of criminal law (in fact treason-felony) and, in the passage cited, a few lines below the actual quotation, Willes J shows that he had criminal sanctions very much in mind, though I would not accept any interpretation which would equate ‘unlawful’ in this context as synonymous with ‘criminal’. Whilst therefore the classical definition is extremely convenient, and will not, I hope, be superseded, it cannot, I think, bear the full weight sought to be placed on it by Lawton LJ in the present case when he said⁹:

a '... we feel bound to declare that the law is as stated by Willes J in Mulcahy's case¹, and if we apply the commonly held opinion that a tort is an unlawful act, it must follow that an agreement to trespass is an indictable conspiracy, no matter what absurd results can be envisaged if prosecutors and judges do not use common sense.'

b The Willes definition¹, or the Denman antithesis², does not mean that all acts which can be described as unlawful are indictable if done in combination. If it did, all illegal contracts, all acts which are in fact tortious however innocent or trivial, and all agreements in the execution of which contracts are broken, might be indictable at the prosecution of any individual, and not merely of the police. The authorities simply do not bear out that view.

c In addition to this, it is clear that there is judicial authority to the contrary effect. In *R v Turner*³, a night poaching case, Lord Ellenborough CJ is, as Lawton LJ⁴ points out, quoted as saying⁵:

d '... I should be sorry to have it doubted whether persons agreeing to go and sport upon another's ground, in other words, to commit a civil trespass, should be thereby in peril of indictment for an offence which would subject them to infamous punishment.'

e It is true that in *R v Rowlands*⁶ Lord Campbell CJ expressed the view referred to by Lawton LJ⁴ that Turner's case³ had been wrongly decided. But this, I think, was because he considered that the combination in *Turner*³ involved the commission of a crime or at least the use, or threat, of illegal force. I do not understand him as contradicting Lord Ellenborough CJ's opinion, but only his application of the doctrine in it to the facts of the case. However that may be, numerous textbooks and judges have continued either to quote *Turner*³ in this connection or at least to repeat in other words Lord Ellenborough CJ's apprehensions, and to say that they would be sorry to think that a stroll by two or more persons across somebody else's park without permission would necessarily subject the strollers to criminal sanctions. On the other side of the coin, I do not think anyone until now has seriously supposed that f Lord Ellenborough CJ intended to sanction the forcible expulsion of the true owner of a close and the occupation of it by trespassers, or the deliberate disruption of the owner's total enjoyment of his property as totally immune from criminal penalties. In this, at least, I have the authority of Lord Denman CJ himself in *R v Kenrick*⁷. Incidentally in that case Lord Denman CJ said plainly⁸:

g 'The whole law of conspiracy, as it has been administered at least for the last hundred years, [sc since 1743] has been thus called in question: for we have sufficient proof that during that period any combination to prejudice another unlawfully has been considered as constituting the offence so called.'

h I am for myself not prepared to say with complete confidence that Lawton LJ⁹ was wholly wrong in claiming that all combinations to commit trespass are therefore indictable. I am prepared to claim, for the reasons given above, that the authorities are not compelling and, since I share Lord Ellenborough CJ's reluctance, as expressed in *R v Turner*¹, which I do not think has even been authoritatively overruled, to accept this conclusion, I turn to the third question I have proposed, namely:

(iii) If combinations involving tortious conduct 'are not all indictable, is there any rational principle on which those which are indictable can be separated from those which cannot?

In my view, there is such a principle, and, in my view, the rational principle can be deduced from the nature of the considerations which have led courts over centuries to decide that they must protect certain wrongs to individuals from acts done by a number which, had they been done by a single wrongdoer, would have given rise to a civil remedy only. A short statement of the case in this regard is contained in the speech of Lord Bramwell in the Mogul case²:

'It has been objected by capable persons, that it is strange that that should be unlawful if done by several which is not if done by one, and that the thing is wrong if done by one, if wrong when done by several; if not wrong when done by one, it cannot be when done by several. I think there is an obvious answer, indeed two; one is, that a man may encounter the acts of a single person, yet not be fairly matched against several. The other is, that the act when done by an individual is wrong though not punishable, because the law avoids the multiplicity of crimes: de minimis non curat lex; while if done by several it is sufficiently important to be treated as a crime.'

A fuller treatment of the same subject is to be found in the report of the Royal Commission on Criminal Law of which Cockburn CJ was chairman shortly after he was responsible for the decision in *R v Warburton*³. This was rather fully quoted by Barry J in *R v Parnell*⁴. The passage concludes:

'It is obvious that a wrongful violation of another man's right committed by many assumes a far more formidable and offensive character than when committed by a single individual. The party assailed may be able by recourse to the ordinary civil remedies to defend himself against the attacks of one. It becomes a very different thing when he has to defend himself against many combined to do him injury. To take the case by way of illustration, that of false representations made to ruin a man's business by raising a belief in his insolvency, such an attempt made by one might be met and repelled. It would obviously assume very different proportions, and a far more formidable character if made by a number of persons confederated together for the purpose, and who should simultaneously and in a variety of directions take measures to effect the common purpose. A variety of other instances, illustrative of the principle, might be put. The law has therefore, and it seems to us wisely and justly established that a combination of persons to commit a wrongful act with a view to injure another, shall be an offence, though the act if done by one would amount to no more than a civil wrong.'

I draw attention to the words 'with a view to injure another' in the last phrase of this quotation. This, coupled with the analysis of the matter with which I preceded the enquiry into these questions, seems to me to give the clue to the answer which we are seeking. Unlike many other torts, trespass is actionable as a civil wrong without proof of actual damage and without proof of any special intention. I do not believe that a combination, the execution of which necessarily involves only a technical infringement of the civil rights of others, is necessarily also indictable. The authorities do not constrain me to say that it is, and I share Lord Ellenborough CJ's¹ reported reluctance to do so. On the other hand, a combination the execution of which has as its object not merely a tort or other actionable wrong, but also either the invasion of the public domain, or the intention to inflict on its victim injury and damage which goes beyond the field of the nominal is indictable, whether the object be achieved by trespass to land, goods or person, by ruin of the reputation through the defamation of character, by the commission of private nuisance, by some contrivance of fraud, by the imposition of force, or by any other means which is tortious. This is in fact the thread which has run through the law from *Hawkins Pleas of the Crown*¹ to Lord Simon LC's speech in the Harris Tweed case², although I do not necessarily indorse the view perhaps implicit in that speech that a combination to injure is necessarily indictable without some element involved in its execution otherwise inherently unlawful. I therefore answer the first of the questions certified by the Court of Appeal³ in the affirmative, but with a qualification. Trespass or any other form of tort can, if intended, form the element of illegality necessary in conspiracy. But in my view, more is needed. Either (1) execution of the combination must invade the domain of the public, as, for instance, when the trespass involves the invasion of a building such as the embassy of a friendly country or a publicly owned building, or (of course) where it infringes the criminal law as by breaching the Statutes of Forcible Entry and Detainer, the Criminal Damage Act 1971 or the laws affecting criminal assaults to the person. Alternatively, (2) a combination to trespass becomes indictable if the execution of the combination necessarily involves and is known and intended to involve the infliction on its victim of something more than purely nominal damage. This must necessarily be the case where the intention is to occupy the premises to the exclusion of the owner's right, either by expelling him altogether (cf per Lord Denman CJ in *R v Kenrick*⁴) or otherwise effectively preventing him from enjoying his property.

Though this latter supervening requirement was clearly satisfied here counsel for the Crown did not seek so to justify the conviction on the first count on this precise ground as count one of the indictment was not drawn so as to include specific reference to the elements recited above except, as has been seen, the invasion of the High Commission. The conviction on the first count can, therefore, only be sustained on the last and narrow ground.

My Lords, in the event, the appeal fails and must be dismissed. There are only two other matters which I wish to add. The first relates to the relative functions of judge and jury, the second to the form which future indictments should take. As to the first, I agree with Lawton LJ⁵ that there is objection in principle to the course adopted by Stable J in *R v Bramley*⁶ in leaving to the jury the question whether a combination is sufficiently a matter of public concern to come within the ambit of the criminal law. The summing-up should follow the established principles. The judge should direct the jury as to what element of fact if established to have been part of the agreement would be an invasion of the public field in either of the main ways I have described. The jury should be left to consider whether that element of fact was part of the agreement and was present to the minds of the accused in making the agreement as part of the action agreed on.

Secondly, as regards the indictment. This will now be governed by the Indictment Rules 1971⁷. We were told that the indictment in the present case was governed by the old rules. I do not think it necessary that the statement of offence should include all the essential ingredients of the offences any more than was required by r 4 (3) of the old rules. But under the new rules it is essential to state as part of the particulars of offence the intention or other special circumstances which must accompany the trespass in order to render the agreement indictable. In the present case, apart from the particular public interest involved in the intention to invade a friendly embassy, this intention would have been to take possession of the premises and perhaps to imprison the occupants. In other cases it might be to disrupt or frustrate the particular use which the owner or occupier was making of the premises at the time or to prevent the owner or occupier from making use of the premises or a specified part of them at all. The only essential is that the particulars of offence should describe the essential elements of the offence in such a way as with the statement of offence to give reasonable information as to the nature of the charge (see rr 5 (1), 6 (a) and (b) with proviso).

For the above reasons, my Lords, I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the speech of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and I am in agreement with it.

LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree with it: and I therefore concur that the appeals should be dismissed.

LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC, in which he sets out the facts and discusses fully the questions of law which arise on this appeal. I agree with him that the appeals should be dismissed and I have nothing to add to what he says with regard to the charge of 'unlawful assembly'. On the more difficult question of 'conspiracy to trespass' I would summarise my views as follows:

(A) An agreement by two or more to commit a trespass is not in itself a criminal offence even though the parties to it know that what they are agreeing to do will constitute a trespass. The dictum of Lord Ellenborough CJ to that effect in *R v Turner*¹ accords with common sense and I think that it was right in law. The reason why doubts as to its correctness have sometimes been expressed is that—as Lawton LJ says—lawyers have fallen into the habit of saying that a criminal conspiracy can be defined as 'an agreement to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means'. That phrase, as my noble and learned friend points out, appears to have been coined by Lord Denman CJ in 1832 in his judgment in *R v Jones*² and was repeated or referred to by him in several later cases, i.e. *R v Seward*³, *R v Peck*⁴ and *King v R*⁵. If one reads what Lord Denman CJ said on those occasions it becomes clear that he did not intend the phrase to constitute a definition of a criminal conspiracy. What he was saying was not that any agreement to do an unlawful act or a lawful act by unlawful means constituted a criminal conspiracy but only that there could be no

a criminal conspiracy unless there was at least an agreement to do an unlawful act or a lawful act by unlawful means. It is to be observed that in R v Kenrick,¹ Lord Denman CJ accepted Lord Ellenborough CJ's dictum in *R v Turner*² as correct though he pointed out that if the object of the agreement had been not simply to 'sport' on the owner's land but to eject him from his property the agreement might well have amounted to a criminal conspiracy. Again the reason why Lord Campbell CJ in *R v Rowlands*³ said that *R v Turner*⁴ had been wrongly decided was not that he disagreed with the view that an agreement to commit a trespass was not 'per se' a criminal conspiracy but because the agreement alleged in *R v Turner*⁴ was if necessary to use force in the course of the trespass. It is true that in *Mulcahy v R*⁵ Willes J in delivering the opinion of the judges said that 'a conspiracy consists in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act or a lawful act by unlawful means' but the offence there charged was of 'feloniously conspiring to deprive the Queen of her style honour and royal name' and—as my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock, pointed out in his speech in *Kneller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v Director of Public Prosecutions*⁶—it is clear from the next sentence that by 'unlawful' Willes J meant 'criminal'. He and his brother judges were not, I am sure, intending to say that every agreement by two or more persons to commit any unlawful act constituted a criminal conspiracy. Indeed, to say so would be absurd. Even in this

d permissive age adultery is still, I suppose, an 'unlawful act' and it would certainly have been so regarded in 1868; but no one could seriously suggest that though adultery is not itself a crime the antecedent agreement to commit it constitutes a criminal conspiracy for which the parties are theoretically liable to be indicted.

(B) An agreement by several to commit acts which if done by one would only amount to a tort may constitute a criminal conspiracy if, as has been said, 'the public has a sufficient interest'—that is to say when the carrying into execution of the agreement would have consequences sufficiently harmful to call for penal sanctions. In the case of an agreement to trespass that might be the case—because, for example, of the nature of the property in which the trespass was to be committed or of the means to be employed in carrying out the trespass or of the object to be achieved by it.

f (C) An indictment which charges as a criminal conspiracy an agreement by two or more to commit an act or acts which would not constitute a crime if done by a single person should always state with precision the circumstances on which the Crown relies as justification for treating the agreement as a criminal offence. Those who drafted the indictment in this case appear to have overlooked this requirement for although there may well have been various elements in the agreement which could

g have been relied on the only one disclosed by the wording of the indictment is that the property on which the trespass was to be committed was the High Commission of Sierra Leone. I have, however, no doubt that there is a 'public interest' in treating an agreement to trespass on premises of that character as a crime and although it is by luck rather than by judgment that the Crown scrapes home counsel for the appellants frankly conceded that on the facts of this case the point as to the form

h of the indictment, which was not mentioned in the certificate, was a technicality.

(D) It is for the judge to decide as a matter of law whether the circumstances alleged in the indictment are sufficient if proved to the satisfaction of the jury to render the

Industrial relations – National Industrial Relations Court – Jurisdiction – Appeals from industrial tribunals – Court's jurisdiction limited to appeals on questions of law – Possibility of order for costs against appellant if appeal not involving question of law – Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 114 – Industrial Court Rules 1971 (SI 1971 No 1777), r 69.

Intending appellants are reminded that under s 114 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 the jurisdiction of the court is limited to appeals on questions of law arising in any proceedings before, or arising out of any decision of, an industrial tribunal. If appeals which involve no question of law are instituted, the court may take the view that the appellant has been guilty of unreasonable conduct in instituting the appeal and make an order for costs or expenses against him pursuant to r 69 of the Industrial Court Rules 1971².
